be described to consist of one act for the benefit of the lieges, and three for coercing them in purse and person. The first is the Bankrupt Bill, which has been no less than eighteen years concocting; and we suspect it will turn out no great specimen of human wisdom after all. To the Judges' Salary Bill, we have, from the first attempt to carry it through, some years ago, to the last moment, given our most strenuous opposition. We have never for a moment doubted of its character; and, now that it has become law, we declare it to be one of the most bare-faced and scandalous jobs ever perpetrated by any ministry, Whig or Tory; more than this we cannot say. The Prison Bill may probably turn out useful, but all our readers will know more about it by and by, in the shape of an assessment. Any merit of its own was quite superfluous to carry it through Parliament, seeing it contained a power of assessing the People, and created patronage. The Rogue Money Bill is also safe, for it contains, not only a power of assessing the counties, but for the country squires to assess the towns without their consent—a power which they will have much pleasure in exercising—although we thought it was pretty well understood that "Taxation without Representation is Tyranny;" so, at least, the Whigs told us sixty years ago. The Rogue Money Bill has also the farther merit of containing in it the germ of a rural police, to be raised and governed by the squirearchy. This police will form a valuable auxiliary to our old friends the Yeomanry, whom Lord John Russell—under the advice and direction of Sir Robert Peel—will, no doubt, see cause, in good time, to re-embody in all those counties in which they were disbanded, some years ago. The Rogue Money Bill will, like its twin sister, also be pretty soon known by its fruits—an assessment. All the other Scottish bills will recommence their career next session. As far as we have observed, Irish Legislation remains in statu quo. Ireland may be thankful. Of late years, Legislation has been a matter, in as far as the governed are concerned, rather to be avoided than desired.

ENGLAND.

THE CHARTISTS.—Monday, the 12th of August, was fixed for the commencement of the Sacred Month; but, as might have been anticipated, the Chartists were not prepared for the attempt. There was, on that day, rather a serious riot at Bolton, which was not quelled till the military were called out and fired a few shots. The trials are proceeding rapidly, and convictions are obtained, in every instance; as might have been expected, where the accused are not tried by a jury of their peers—i. e., of working men—but of the middle class. The zeal of the juries has indeed, in some instances, far outrun their discretion. At Chester, a bill was presented to the Grand Jury, charging certain parties with sedition; but the jury, not content with so slight a charge, asked the judge whether they could not find a charge of treason; and, being told that they had better leave the legal gentlemen to conduct the trial in their own way, the foreman then inquired if the jury had the "power" to find a true bill for high treason! The facts out of which the charge arose, were, that a gun-maker had dispatched muskets for sale to other two parties, in whose possession they were found, and all three were brought to trial. How any one could suppose that this amounted to high treason, we cannot conceive; for it appears to us to be no offence at all. Mr Stephens was tried at Chester. He conducted his own defence, and spoke for five hours. The jury found him guilty in five minutes, and he was sentenced to eighteen months imprisonment. Dr John Taylor has been acquitted, the Crown declining to adduce evidence against him. It is evident, from the proceedings of the magistrates and juries, which appear to us to go to the utmost verge of the law, that the middle class in England are seriously alarmed at the Chartist movement. The rigorous measures that are taken may suppress it for the present; but it will again break out, unless steps be adopted to remove the well-founded causes of the discontent of the working classes. Among these causes, the Starvation or Rent-Laws, are the most prominent; and we are glad to observe that Mr Oastler, in a letter to Lord

John Russell, has intimated that the Chartist agitation may be turned on them. The hold which Chartist doctrines have got, may be estimated from the circulation of The Northern Star, Mr Feargus O'Connor's paper. It appears, from a stamp-office return, that the average circulation was 42,077 weekly, in the three months, April, May, June, though the paper had only been established for a year and a-half. The only paper which exceeds it in circulation, is the London Weekly Dispatch, the circulation of which is 50,000 weekly. It openly advocates pure Republican opinions: the extent of its circulation must therefore be rather alarming to the admirers of the existing order of things.

CANADA.

The Canadian newspapers, almost without an exception, concur in reprobating the procrastinating policy of the Home Government, in postponing a settlement of the affairs of the provinces till 1842. The expediency of a union of Upper and Lower Canada is very generally admitted; and the delay is characterised as "truly lamentable, and exceedingly unfortunate," as "a plan for the perpetration of confusion, and the encouragement of rebellion." The Toronto Examiner talks of the Ministry in the most indignant strain, as "the vacillating, imbecile Melbourne Cabinet;" "that imbecile and heartless renegade who disgraces the name of Russell," &c., &c. The writer proceeds—"We firmly believe that the late proceedings in Parliament have caused thousands, who never dreamt of separation, to contemplate such an event without repugnance. Our belief is, that the motto of the Reform candidates, at the next election, will be "Lord Durham's Report, or Amicable Separation." The sooner, in our opinion, a separation takes place the better; for it is inevitable in a very few years. Meanwhile, the present state of matters is injurious equally to the mother country and the colony. Upwards of 20,000 of the Colonists have been, for a year or two, withdrawn from the cultivation of their farms, to act as militiamen; and many of them will never resume habits of industry. Such a proportion of the population being taken from their ordinary employment, must be most injurious to the colony. We have at present 14,000 troops of the line in the two provinces; and, as it requires about ten millions to keep on foot 100,000 men, this force costs the people of the United Kingdom £1,400,000 per annum; and we may add, at least, £600,000 for the expense of the Navy and Civil Government. The whole annual imports from Canada do not exceed a million in value; so that, if we were to get them all for nothing they would only repay, by one-half, our annual expenditure on the colony. Yet the encouraging of that paltry trade has now, for thirty years, almost annihilated our commerce with many of the states on the Baltic; for, while the inferior Canadian timber is allowed to be imported free, that of the Baltic is loaded with a duty—almost amounting to a prohibition—of sixty-five shillings per load. We repeat, the sooner we have an amicable separation with Canada, the better for all parties.

TRADE AND MANUFACTURES.

The disturbed state of the manufacturing districts, and the scarcity of money, have tended greatly to depress manufactures; and little has been doing of late either in goods or yarn. Two or three failures have taken place at Manchester, and more are likely to follow, owing to the stoppage of a London house connected with Manchester. By the last accounts from America, the price of cotton was falling; the crop was not expected to be so large as in 1837, but still it was estimated to be little inferior, and to amount to 1,600,000 bales. The French Government has proposed to our Government to renew the negotiations relative to a mutual reduction of the high duties on the import of goods from each country. The duties charged here are quite preposterous. The duty on wine is said by the French to run from 430 to 500 per cent., that on brandy from 700 to 1000 per cent.;

and they allege, that though the duty on silks and cottons is stated in our tariff at thirty per cent., it really amounts to forty-five, from the manner in which it is charged. The Belgians feel much alarmed at any reduction of the duty on British linens imported into France; but the French express their opinion, that twenty per cent. on linens and linen yarns is quite high enough. It appears, however, from an answer by Soult to a memorial from the owners of vineyards in France, that the French Government is as much bigoted with regard to the reciprocity system as our own. It is remarkable, that it cannot be seen, that the people of Britain would be benefited by having cheap wines, instead of a mixture of grain whisky and turpentine as a beverage, even although the French choose to continue to consume bad and dear iron of their own manufacture, instead of good and cheap British iron. But the reciprocity doctrine is one which is sedulously kept up by our landed interest, who are determined that there shall be no free trade in food or drink, lest rent be reduced in consequence.

AGRICULTURE.

The advices from Italy and the south of Europe, generally, state the crops do not turn out so well as expected and a considerable speculative demand for grain has sprung up. In the south of France the yield of wheat is deficient, but the quality good. At Dantzic, prices of wheat rose, in the beginning of August, from 6s. 6d. to 7s. 6d. a-quarter, and fine high-mixed wheat brought 54s. and 55s.; freights had also risen 6d. per quarter. The accounts from almost all districts of Britain lead to the expectation of an average crop, and nothing more. The rains which, during August, prevailed over all the three kingdoms, must have deteriorated the quality, if it has not lessened the quantity of all sorts of grain. In Scotland, the crops are from three weeks to a fortnight later than in ordinary seasons. The averages have of late been rising, and we see no great chance of a fall, considering the lateness of the harvest, and that the stock of last crop on hand is unusually small. We hope, therefore, if the working classes co-operate with the middle classes, now that there is no immediate prospect of obtaining Universal Suffrage, that the Corn Laws will receive a severe shake during the next session of Parliament. But without a long pull and a strong pull, nothing will be effected; the landed interest, united as it is, is more than a match for either the operatives or middle class separately.

At the first Falkirk Tryst, held on 13th August, a greater number of cattle were shewn than at any former period, there being at least 10,000 head in the field. Lean cattle sold for at least 7½ per cent. above last year's prices. Angus bullocks, three years' old, brought £10 to £11; two years' old, £7:10s. to £9; West Highland stots, three years' old, £6 and £6:6s. The best lot of fat cattle brought £15:10s., or 10s. per stone. Tron weight, and inferior lots, 9s. to 9s. 6d. per stone. At Melrose Lamb Fair, held the same day, there was a great demand both for Cheviot and half-bred lambs. The best lot of top Cheviot wedder lambs brought 13s. each. Several large lots of the same description sold for 10s. and 10s. 6d. each. The price of half-breds was from 11s. to 20s. each. The rise on Cheviots is from 1s. to 2s. a-head on last year's prices. At Lockerbie Lamb Fair, also held on the 13th August, 40,000 head were shewn. The demand was uncommonly brisk, and prices good. Last year the best lot of half-breds brought 20s. 3d., while the highest lot this year was sold for 22s. 6d. Many lots brought 20s. to 20s. 6d. The inferior lots ran from 12s. to 14s. 6d. each. On all descriptions of half-breds the rise on last year's prices was 1s. to 1s. 6d. a-head. Cheviots sold from 8s. to 11s. 6d. Best black-faced lambs brought from 7s. to 8s. 6d.; inferior, 6s. to 6s. 6d. The price of wool was as follows:—Blackfaced, laid, 9s. to 9s. 6d. per stone of 24 lbs.; White, untarred and unwashed, 11s. 6d. to 13s.; Laid Cheviot, washed, 17s. to 18s.; White Cheviot, washed, 28s. to 30s.

OCTOBER, 1839.

THE LAST CABINET MOVE; OR, SHUFFLING FOR LUCK.

LORD LYNDHURST has, this year, taken our customary office out of our hands, and Reviewed the Session; thus sparing us a task which, year after year, becomes more and more melancholy. We are not particular admirers of his Lordship as a statesman, under any aspect, but we are bound to say that he has done the business in a fair, lucid, succinct, and business-like manner—beginning with the Queen's opening speech, proceeding regularly through each abandoned or abortive measure, and ending, exactly where he set out, with another Royal speech. Between these two dots, the long Session of 1839 now lies like an almost invisible line. During the first five months of the Session, not a single Bill of any importance passed the two Houses of Parliament. "Legislation was a perfect blank;" but, when the Members had deserted their posts, at the call of the gor-cock, leaving some ninety or a hundred to form a Melbourne Parliamentary Board, business came on and went off pell-mell. It is true, however, that the money votes had been speeded in excellent time by her Majesty's "zealous and faithful Commons," whatever may have become of those measures of Justice to Ireland and that settlement of Canada, which, in the Royal speech, were assumed to be essential. Other measures were touched upon as matters of great urgency, but which, like Ireland and Canada, we must contrive to do without; as no more is heard about Ecclesiastical or Admiralty Court reforms than about any other reforms. Probably the appointments of Mr Sheil and Mr Wyse, the title and sinecure of Mr Spring Rice, and the Shannon Navigation Bill, may be regarded, by Mr O'Connell, as handsome instalments of justice to the nation whose retainer he holds; while the appointment of Mr Poulett Thomson may be considered an ample equivalent for the non-settlement of Canada, which is thus stimulated, and also permitted time, to settle itself.

But if the scheme of policy, unfolded at the opening of the Session, has been either surrendered at discretion, postponed, or abandoned, bit by bit, as its principles came under discussion, some measures have been thrust upon the Whig Government, which have once more tried its metal, and found it to ring hollow as ever. The question of Ballot gave Ministers an opportunity to shuffle and disgrace themselves; and that of the Abolition of the Corn-Laws enabled them to gratify the Tories and landed interest, and to set their faces boldly against the People. They were half tricked out of the Postage Bill, playing for a little popularity, and trusting, as many a time and oft they had done successfully, that the Lords would take the odium upon themselves, of throwing out this, with every popular national measure which the Cabinet secretly disliked but durst not openly resist. But we must not wholly blame them. Though the Admiralty Court Bill has been postponed, the increase of useful, active Dr Lushington's salary—yea, the salary of the Judge of the Court of Admiralty—is carried; and if the scandalous enormity of fictitious votes (begun by the Whigs) could not be checked in Scotland, it was not found difficult to raise the salaries of the Scotch Judges; the Parliament being on all such points quite worthy of the Administration. Lord John Russell, among those oracles of wisdom which drop from him at unexpected times, said, in a late Session, that it was not the business of a Ministry to make laws but to execute them. He may have been acting upon this principle in the last Session; and would he only uniformly act upon it, there might be little cause of complaint; but while it seems to be the proper function of the Administration to propose arbitrary Police Bills, it appears equally its duty to postpone or oppose every measure tending to enlarge or secure the liberties of the People. In the past Session it has been demonstrated, that, to any practical purpose, the right of petition no longer exists.

But, in the past Session, the after-piece, the farce of Shuffling the Cards for Luck, turns out, as it ought to do, more diverting than the serious drama. Though only a slight two-act piece, it is imagined to have some deep intricate plot—so intricate and so deep that no one can find it out; which, accordingly, for any purpose of satisfying the spectators, is worse than having no plot at all. Last year at the same season of shuffling and cutting for partners and honours, there was a manifest desire, in certain quarters, to get rid of Spring Rice, Lord Glenelg, and Lord John Russell. The former has, in capitulating, made excellent terms for himself; and, if there be any gall in Lord Glenelg's composition, he has found quick and signal revenge, in the breaking down of his successor before he was well set up, and in the exposure of the incapacity and dishonesty of those who thrust Lord Normanby into a place for which, if they did not know him to be unfit, they were unfit for their own. But what shall we say of Lord John? No getting rid of him, whose remaining in office is so great a favour; a blessing of such magnitude to his grateful country as no Minister ever conferred before. The Marquis of Normanby could not get rid of him, although he had really wished it; because Lord Melbourne could not do without him, even although his wishes had been reciprocal with those of Dublin Castle and Darrynane. And now all manner of conjectures are afloat, and people puzzle themselves in guessing at what Lord John is after, and how he is to get rid of Lord Normanby. We have respect enough for his understanding, apart from other motives, to believe that such may be Lord John's wish.—Many sensible persons imagine that this game of "Change seats, the Queen's coming," is merely got up like a pantomime or mock tournament, to divert the People, and cause a little talk; that it is like some holiday pastime or "Twelfth Night" frolic, where Liston struts, for that night only, as Coriolanus; and Macready grins, in Tony Lumpkin, by particular desire. We did expect, as we intimated two months since, that the Government would try their engineering skill in propping and buttressing the unstable fabric, at their first leisure, so as to gain, by means however clumsy, some real additional strength—by fortifying the erection in the rear, though it was impossible to obtain a sound foundation; and by beautifying the front with a fair coat of new plaster. But, no—the Cabinet has positively lost in strength, and gained nothing in beauty. The house of Grey has withdrawn its strength; and statesmen of the order of Mr Macauley and Mr Ward are cautious about lending their helping hand, where there is imminent risk of speedily bringing an old house about their ears. Not the most unblushing and well-paid Government scribe can shew what the Government has gained, in internal energy or in popular confidence, by the slight change from Grey to emerald green, in its complexion. What is Mr Sheil, under Labouchere's knee, at the Board of Trade? As a mere thorough partisan, they had him before; and, besides, there were surely Members enough of the Cabinet to defend the Corn-Laws and the landed monopolies, without the Member for Tipperary. We remember Mr Sheil a violent Repealer in his day. Whether does he consider that certain recent appointments include a handsome instalment of "Justice to Ireland; or are we now free to dub him, on his own suggestion, "Sheil of the silk gown?" the recreant to Repeal! But if Mr Sheil was a violent, O'Connell was a tremendous, Repealer; something, however, (the profane allege,) must be done to make the pot boil; and Mr O'Connell comes out, this recess, in the double character of propagandist and Whig helper; flattering the Catholic clergy on the one side, and doing something quietly for the good of the tottering house in Downing Street upon the other; while "Justice to Ireland," which a gentleman at his ripe years would need to set about in right-down earnest, if he hoped to live to see it gained, is left pretty much to shift for itself. We have somewhere on record a prophecy, that the last Herculean labour of the Whigs, will be the undermining of O'Connell's power to serve Ireland. They have, for the moment, ruined the Radical party. He is neither so testy, nor yet is he so generous and unsuspecting, as the English Radicals, but he has his assailable points; and if he has found out the yielding nature of the Whigs, they have also discovered whereabouts he is vulnerable. Could we know positively the degree in which the Catholic part of the Irish nation still implicitly believe in the divinity or saintship of "The Liberator," it were a perfect test of the actual state of political intelligence among them.—We were considering about the new face of the Cabinet. Having anticipated a propping and buttressing system, we are really disappointed at a mere change of chairs and masks, or shuffling the pack to try for luck, the last resource of the losing and desperate gambler, who, having cut and shuffled to change the luck, if very superstitious, insists also upon changing seats, just like the Marquis of Normanby and Lord John Russell. Every one is speculating upon the meaning of these freaks; but "true no-meaning puzzles more than wit," and no one can discover a trace of any consistent scheme of policy in these movements beyond the mere fact, that certain individuals are happily disposed of, and others, of like calibre, replace them. While all is guess work, let us start a new hypothesis; but, as we are not dogmatic, we bid no one receive it unless he choose.

It is long since we gave up JOHN RUSSELL as a Reformer. To Reform he has been detrimental, directly and indirectly, beyond any other Member of the Government:—it is long since we gave him up. He is our own Finality John, whom we christened; for which purpose we were forced to adopt an ugly new word which is not English, nor to be found in any language, and which is Moore and Lady Morgan for two; and as to Miss Edgeworth, we presume to say, there is no comparison to be made between their qualifications for that office.

* This appointment, we hold to be rank injustice to other Irishmen and Irish ladies, possessing exactly the same sort of qualifications for presiding at the Board of Trade as Mr Sheil, and in a far higher degree. There

Englishmen will reject from their language, as they will the principle which it signifies from their political creed. Yet, relatively, we were far from being insensible to Lord John's usefulness in the Government, even before he became, politically, the entire Government himself. When discussing the intrigue hatching this time twelvemonth, which issued in Lord Normanby being cursed with his granted prayer, we appreciated Lord John at his full value, in saying that he possessed, and could display, some powers of resistance in a right direction. These powers, the Constitutional Whig did not think fit to display in May last, when the ladies of the bed-chamber—the Ministers, not being able to kick aside the land-marks of the constitution—fairly galloped over them, with the Ministers in their train; and, among others, Lord John;—so disgusted, so sickened with office, all the while, that he can never muster strength enough to resign; or, if he quit the Home Office, it is to repose in the bed of roses spread in the Colonial Office. Lord John cannot be without some motive for the course he has taken. The good of the country must, of course, be the principal motive with every statesman; but the secondary, or subsidiary consideration is that we have to investigate. Now our Finality Minister may not be wholly devoid of ambition. He has crept and crept on, and ascended many rounds of the ladder, since he acted as a rather insignificant Member of Earl Grey's Government. The latent jealousy of the lowly yet aspiring scion of the house of Russell, towards the house of Grey, is quite as comprehensible in its origin as it is now manifest. Our hypothesis—the reader may call it fanciful if he will—assumes that Lord John believes himself qualified to be the sole Executive; the possessor of all the substantial power of the Government which he would hold, save for the counteracting force of two or three persons, Lord Melbourne not being one of the obnoxious. With that good easy Lord for the Court, and himself for the Cabinet, the proper complement of clever well-disciplined clerks, graced with the name of secretary, and so forth, a Finality Government, we admit, might be much more easily carried on, than in concert with self-willed or headstrong equals, intriguing for power and influence. By our hypothesis, the thing has worked well hitherto. The Earl of Durham's vanity fell into the snare, and he is effectually damaged. Lord Howick, and the whole Grey kind, are either ousted or snubbed; and, to carry this great point, Lord John condescends to take the Colonies himself. Poor Mr Poulett Thomson has been shipped off, to be sacrificed, we cannot well guess for what object; but, at least, it spites the Grey connexion; and now, only Lord Normanby remains to be dealt with, who has kindly played into the hands of his enemies. He had injured himself deeply, with reflecting people, by his vagaries in Ireland,—the temporary lull he obtained being bought at a very dear rate; but, in the Colonial Office, his rise and fall were about simultaneous. "Now," quoth our hypothetical Lord John, "rather than old Grey's son get planted in office—in the very important office to which the family ambition points—I'll take it myself; and, by changing with Normanby, give the husband of the Queen's friend full opportunity of demonstrating what a ninny he is, "fool him to the top of his bent," until Court and country are agreed as to his merits. The People of England are not absolute fools. They know Melbourne, they begin to understand Normanby, and they think they know me. All the moderate Tories, with the whole of the Conservative Whigs, will support me, against the Normanbys and Durhams. Melbourne, with the name of Premier, manages that irksome department, St James's, for me. Let who will come into favour, I cannot now be dispensed with, while a shred of the Whig Government hangs together. Every change has strengthened my position in the Government, which, if it stand at all, can only stand through me."

But can it stand at all? Before coming to that, let us dispose of our plausible hypothesis. Lord John, it may be said, is dying, always just about to give up the ghost when any push comes—worn out, tired, sickened of office, which he only holds from the vehement patriotic desire, entertained by his Finalityship, to keep out the Radicals and the Tories. Our readers will remember a certain cunning and ambitious Cardinal, who coveted the Papal Throne, and, accordingly, affected to be very aged, very feeble and sickly—coughing, and stooping on his staff, humble and apostolic. On the death of the reigning Pope, he was unanimously elected by the Conclave; each Cardinal secretly flattering himself that the feeble old man could not long survive, and that his own chance of the Keys of St Peter was improved by such a choice. But behold! out came the humble aged priest—a hale and rampant Pope! His sly Holiness may not be the exact parallel of our now brave Finality John, but there is matter in it; and, if the Government can go on at all, he will demonstrate as much, at least to the conviction of all his colleagues. But can it go on? The shuffle has not strengthened it, whatever it may have done for Lord John Russell individually. What is Earl Grey thinking of John Russell's Government; what the large and respectable body of middle-class Whigs, to whom Earl Grey represents all that now remains of the Fox party? Earl Clarendon seems as sulky as the Earl of Durham. The Greys are off in wrath and bitterness; the Macauleys, Wards, and such like Waiters on Providence, fight shy, or are in a dormant state. They don't dislike office; they are far too patriotic for that, and most willing, to a man, to serve their beloved country, simply for that beloved country's sake; but they fear, as we remarked above, to bring an old house about their own ears.

Toryism in the meanwhile, or, at least, apathetic indifference to public affairs, is rapidly spreading in the country. The signs of reviving Toryism are becoming more and more distinct among the People—thanks to the insane violence of the Chartists, and double thanks to her Majesty's Finality Ministers! The case of Cambridge was marked enough, but that of Manchester there is no mistaking; nor are we sure whether, after the Whig victory is obtained, Colonel Thompson would not have been as acceptable to the Government as Mr Greg. Upon what principle can the supporters of the present Administration account for the sweeping change of popular feeling in Manchester; save that (call it Toryism or what we will) public opinion is now about as hostile to them as it was at first favourable to Earl Grey's Administration. The shuffling of the pack for luck, is a thing only to be laughed at, if it shall be boasted that it has given, or can give, additional strength. There may be a little more freedom of action gained; and we shall wait, without much hope, to see how that freedom may be used.

But besides fostering the spirit of Toryism, the Government has also worked hard to exalt the Peers with the nation. Lord Brougham, by his talents and energies, may elevate and illustrate his order, and fix attention on the House in which he appears; but it is the Finality Ministers who have raised Lord John's "whisper of a faction" into a voice, potent with the country; and made those now exclaim, who, four years since, scouted that cry, "Thank God for the Peers!" And do not Reformers owe the Whigs deep thanks for all these blessings? Do they not deserve to be kept in office until they have completed the good work, so happily begun, of quenching the spirit of improvement, and exalting the House of Peers at the expense of the House of Representatives; humbled, exposed, and dragged through the dirt after them?

In the meanwhile, are the broken and scattered bands of Radical Reformers, to sit down supinely and give up the ship, because incapable pilots, in whom they placed unmerited trust, have run it among the breakers, and it has all but foundered? We trust in heaven not. The Chartist demonstration, doubly foolish from being so ill-timed as to run counter to the Corn-Law agitation, is happily at an end. The eyes of the hood-winked People, ever trusting and ever deceived, are now fully opened to the true character of some of their leaders. But the elements of agitation are yet rife. The intelligent Chartists hold to the principles of their creed, though they have cast off some of its wicked and foolish priests; and if they do not now cordially coalesce with the middle classes, in a renewed struggle upon a broader field, and comprehending more extended interests, those common to both; namely, cheap bread, Ballot, and an extended franchise—we venture to think the fault will not lie with them. There is little hope of bread becoming so plentiful in the ensuing season as to deaden the feelings of the People on a question so essential to their comfort; although it did not comprehend the ultimate ruin or prosperity of the land of their fathers and their children. But if the commercial classes, and the great manufacturers, have this one object and Ballot; the working classes have these, and another. They justly desire more political power—to be admitted to the Franchise, in order to secure the full advantages to which their industry entitles them. The new agitation, to be greatly successful, must therefore be on a broader basis. Tories and mere Whigs would see fifty National Conventions, and laugh at, despise, and put down each in turn, rather than a hearty union among the middle and the labouring classes, for obtaining Household Suffrage, the Ballot, and the abolition of the Food-Taxes. And on these three points, there is fortunately room for mutual friendly yielding. The working men don't mind the Ballot, for they do not require its protection; and the ten-pounders disregard extended or Household Suffrage, because they have the Franchise already. So each has here something to give up, while on the Corn-Law monopoly they are on common ground. Here, then, is a broad and solid basis for the fresh and hopeful Agitation we hope to see commenced. A broader might be better, BUT A NARROWER WILL NOT DO.

REMINISCENCES OF A RELIGIOUS MANIAC.

Those who have been always sane, can form no idea of the most dreadful calamity to which humanity is liable, save from the analogy of dreaming. "Every man is mad in his dreams;" and the varying characters and modifications of insanity in different individuals, or in the same individual at different stages of mental derangement, are as various as are dreams.

The mania of the unfortunate gentleman whose singular case we are about to analyze, from his Confessions and Recollections, was analogous to that continued and frightful nightmare to which Coleridge alludes, as "the howling wilderness of sleep," through which he was whirled when under the influence of opium, or ill from its effects; a condition only short, in exquisite misery, of that which made Cowper exclaim, when comparing madness with the worst forms of disease, "But oh, the fever of the mind!" This mental fever, to which all physical suffering is comparative ease and happiness—this "howling wilderness" through which the patient is scourged awake, and with all his distempered perceptions and feelings preternaturally acute, has seldom been so vividly and minutely traced as by the individual whose afflicting narrative is before us. In many cases of insanity, the memory of what passed while the disease was running its course, is entirely obliterated. In others, memory becomes though not more accurate, yet more intense than in health; as what lunatics feel strongly they remember vividly, if memory acts at all; and whether by fits or consecutively, as in the rational state.

What is termed religious melancholy, or madness, is often, we should imagine, erroneously so designated. Though something like bewildered notions on religion may mingle with the other manifestations of the symptoms of the disease, the same thing holds of many other objects of speculation; and the wandering mind may not be more deranged about religion than about any other passion or object by which it is excited. But if ever there was a case of purely Religious Madness, it is the singular one of our patient, as revealed in his Confessions. And his is no fictitious nor remote tale: its date is so recent as 1830, the period of the Row miracles, the Pentecost of Port-Glasgow and the Gare Loch, where probably much genuine and fervid piety mingled with what was either sheer insanity, the wildest delusion, or blasphemous presumption.

The gentleman to whose case we refer, from a conviction of its special importance at this crisis, as much as its interest with medical and metaphysical inquirers, is a younger, and, we believe, the third son of the late Mr Percival, the Prime Minister, who was assassinated by Bellingham in the lobby of the House of Commons. He was then a little boy, just old enough to be much impressed and affected by the distress of his mother and his elder brothers and sisters. He has since sometimes fancied that the death of his father was at the root of all his misfortunes. The Percival family, previously connected with the Aristocracy and wealth of the country, were, it will be remembered, amply provided for by Parliament; and the subject of our article was, as he tells, "educated in the bosom of peace and plenty, in principles of delicacy and decorum, in modest and temperate habits, and in the observance of, and real veneration for, the religion of his country." Mr Percival's widow, we think, married either her own chaplain or the clergyman of her parish, at no very distant period after the calamity which excited so much sympathy for her and her large young family; but of his stepfather we find Mr Percival making no mention, either for good or evil. At the age of seventeen he left the public school at which he was educated, and studied for some time with a private tutor. A boyish inclination led him to prefer a military life, for which he was probably very ill adapted; and he obtained, from the Duke of York, first, a commission in a cavalry regiment, and then was allowed to exchange into the Guards. His private life and studies were the most opposite in the world to those of a young guardsman, whose pursuits and place in fashionable society are (the colour of the coat apart) much the same as that of the Abbé of the Parisian boudoir, under the old régime. The whole Percival family were tinctured with what was, in those profane days, termed fanaticism, of which the elder brother has since made some rather singular displays in Parliament; and our young officer was early remarkable, in gay society, for occasional absence of mind, and a gravity and silence which rebuked the levity and indecorum of his companions, when they made light of religion or offended against morality. His narrative states—

I was firm also in resisting all attempts to drive me by ridicule into intemperance. In private I had severe conflict of mind upon the truth and nature of the Christian religion, accompanied with acute agony at my own inconsistency of conduct and sentiment with the principles of duty and feeling taught by Jesus and his apostles; and mingled with astonishment at the whirlpool of dissipation and contradiction in society around me.

After a long period of conflict, he found, for a time, as he then imagined, "joy and peace in believing" in the doctrines termed evangelical. The system on which he rested at this period was high unmitigated Calvinism. In 1829 his conduct became so singular as to be marked; and, in the following year, he resolved to leave the army, and was "permitted to sell his commission."

The ostensible object of Mr Percival in penning these reminiscences, which he entitles, "A Narrative of the Treatment of a Gentleman during a state of Mental Derangement," is mainly to expose the injudicious and cruel or harsh treatment to which many of the helpless insane are subjected: and all the insane are most helpless. In a medical point of view, and to physicians, this narrative is invaluable. Physicians theorize, and mad-doctors, as they are called, experiment, too much in the dark; but here there is no guess-work: it is the individual who has suffered every agony which sympathetically thrills the compassionate reader, who here tells his own tale. He gives the facts—they may draw the inferences; and, though differing widely from him, may yet profit largely.

By the latest statistical returns from our public Lunatic Asylums, it would appear that, while medical science is slowly advancing in other departments of disease, little or no progress is made in the treatment of the worst of all maladies. The average of cures in the London hospitals is not greater than it was a century ago; but the frequency of insanity, in our luxurious and uneasy society, is becoming greater every year. Sir Henry Hallford remarks of the profession:—"Our knowledge of insanity has not kept pace with our knowledge of other distempers, from the habit we find established of transferring patients under this malady, as soon as it has declared itself, to the care of persons who too frequently limit their attention to the mere personal security of their patients. . . . We want facts in the history of this disease."—And here they are supplied. Mr Percival has not only thrown open the cells of the madhouse, but minutely unfolded the disordered action of his own mind and senses, while in a state of insanity which, not long since, would have been regarded as a case of demoniac possession. By some it may be still looked upon in this light; and although his mind has risen from that total obscurity in which he believed in his own spiritual being and agency, in present miracles, and his own power to work miracles—he at times appears to feel, as indeed Cowper, and as Robert Hall have felt—that there is something in all this not yet to be fully understood.

There is occasionally apparent incoherence, but there is also sober-mindedness and great acuteness in his recapitulation of his opinions and motives of conduct, when he was acting in the most extravagant manner—a violent lunatic. No one is now more fully sensible of the truth of his lunacy; though its clouds were passing away, and had nearly vanished before he became so, save in those fits and starts—those fitful but hopeful glimmerings between light and darkness, so torturing to the patient, and which require so much discretion, delicacy, and sagacity from those who have the care of him, and which do not, we fear, always find them.

Mr Percival was with his regiment in Dublin when he embraced, with deep sincerity and fervent enthusiasm, the doctrines of extreme Calvinism:—

I imagined the light of everlasting truth, given me freely through the election of God the Father, for the sake of the obedience and sacrifice of Jesus Christ, and to the end that His own glory might be made manifest, in changing a vile and weak creature into the likeness of Divine holiness, excited in me gratitude and fear; gratitude for the gift given me, and for that election; and fear of the wrath of God, if I disobeyed the end for which it was given. That which had been done for me, I thought it my duty to preach to others, and to explain the doctrines whereby I had been saved. Moved by these arguments, I spoke and acted in open confession of my faith—a line of conduct not very agreeable to the army, even if called for and judicious. Being then in Dublin, I attached myself to a society for reading the Scriptures to the Irish poor; I attended the regimental schools; I read the service to a detachment I commanded, as the men had not seats provided for them in church; I tried to establish a reading-room for the soldiers of my battalion; I procured religious and other books for the sick in hospital.

Both the colonel and chaplains shewed some symptoms of chagrin—they charged me with having sent the men to a dissenting minister.

In 1827, he had been in actual service in Portugal. The campaign was bloodless; but the alternate idleness and fatigue, and the irregularity of life, was disagreeable to one who confesses, that, even then, he was better able to confute a Papist or an Infidel, without committing himself, than to manœuvre a battalion or even to direct a company; and he judged, too, that a better cause than that of Kings and Constitutions, “the instruments and the embodyings of the spirit of Satan,” was required to justify the sacrifice of his comfort and happiness.

Mr Percival seeks too many reasons to justify his leaving the army. The Tory party had entirely lost his esteem; he was not surprised at the Duke of Wellington's change of policy in yielding the Catholic claims; but he began to fear that there might be an idea of putting down the will of the People for Reform by the bayonet; and Mr Percival, who really had no vocation to a military life, wished to be free to choose his side. He is now sensible of his many delusions; but, at that period, he, with the Irvingites, imagined, among other things—was about to visit the nations with his plagues, his promises having been rejected; and finding in Scripture an exhortation to his people to come out in those days from the profane, and to flee to the mountains, &c., &c., I reflected whether the words had not a practical, as well as a figurative application, and I deemed it right to place myself at liberty to act as I might be enlightened.

That the time of the end was at hand, and that God

So, seeking liberty, I fell into confinement; seeking to serve the Almighty, I disgraced his worship and my own name. . . . My own mind also had undergone a complete change in its views of the Christian faith, principle; and duty, and God knows my courage was submitted to severe trial.

While the fever of religious enthusiasm, begun in Dublin, lasted, he was in the third heavens.—When this fever is spent, as spent it must be, as surely as the first passion of love or of grief, then comes the trying crisis. Some, in waxing cold, substitute cant and affectation, if not gross hypocrisy, for their departed rapturous faith. Others, purer and nobler minded, go mad. There is, no doubt, another frequent and happier result; but this is not to our present purpose. Mr Percival became deranged; and his own words best describe the stages of his progress to confirmed insanity.

Now, my readers, come with me to Oxford. I have stated that I imagined I had found peace and triumph in the doctrines of the evangelical preachers; I add, and it follows of course, joy unutterable and full of glory. At first this was the case. . . . But when I returned to England, I stood alone, amongst society, and amongst officers, gentlemanly and moderate, but indifferent to spiritual truths, and inclined to turn religion or too much religion into ridicule, I felt first puzzled, then undecided, then mistrustful of myself, then mistrustful of my call to be a disciple of Christ Jesus—I became lukewarm—I became inconsistent—I fell into sin—I expected to have been kept from sin by the Holy Spirit—that was my idea of salvation—that I understood was the gift promised to me in the Gospel. Now, at times, I feared that I was a castaway—at times, I threw away all fear, in bold but contrite reliance on the pledged word of the Almighty, for on that alone I fancied I had relied; therefore when I left the army, I desired in my own mind to retire to study at Dublin, which I called MY CRADLE IN THE SPIRIT, because there I might unite society with study, and be corroborated in practice by the example of the zealous churchmen in that city. Religion is not amongst them a matter of form and ceremony: it is the motive and end of their life. My duty to my mother, however, and my attachment to England, determined me to choose an English university; and a hope of acquiring habits of regularity, made me fix on Oxford. I was pleased with my choice. The order, the quiet, the cleanliness, the beautiful simplicity of character I met with there—the majesty, the elegance, the antiquity of the buildings, the variety of their architecture, their solidity, their preservation, with all the means of study, repose, and reflection, enchanted me. I only regretted that I had not retired from a military life earlier. I only wanted, as I thought, a wife to add to my tranquillity. The evangelical doctrines I put faith in having at that time very few preachers in the church, I often frequented the Baptist and Independent meeting-houses, to hear the preachers. Soon after entering Oxford, I attended a dissenting chapel; but being warned of the offence I might give to the authorities, by continuing such a course, I gave it up after my matriculation; and then went to a church where a gentleman of the name of Bultee preached, in a vehement manner, doctrines then almost peculiar to himself, and in the highest degree Calvinistic. . . .

About the middle of June, news came to Oxford of the extraordinary occurrences at Row and at Port-Glasgow. One evening I had crossed the river from the Christ Church meadows, and walking down the bank, through the fields on the opposite side, with two or three com-pansions, our conversation turned on that subject: one said, if it were not for my books and other property in Oxford, I should go to Scotland to make inquiry. I replied, if I thought it true, I would sell my books and clothes, if they were all that I had, to pay for my journey. The tidings were, however, so contradictory, that I did not credit the report.

It may be as well to remark here, that I had for many years often fasted, and had lately added to this discipline, watching, accompanied with prayer. It was my delight to wake in the night to pray, according to the example of David—"At midnight also will I praise Thee." On two occasions previous to my arrival at Oxford, during earnest prayer, I had seen visions, each of which shortly after I saw them I found were pictures of what came to pass in reality, though with certain variations; which I account for by my disobedience to the spirit of the vision. You do not understand this, my reader, nor do I.

When Mr Percival speaks as above, and in the present tense, he perplexes the reader; for there is no doubt that now he believes his notions, concerning the immediate fulfilling of the Divine prophecies of the end of the world, wild delusions. In passing through London, he saw Mr Henry Drummond—now, if not even then, an angel or evangelist, or in some high order of inspired teachers in the late Mr Irving's church—and received through this dangerous medium a farther account of the revivals and manifestations at Row and Port-Glasgow. In Glasgow he picked up the current pamphlets on the nature of the new miracles, and proceeded to Row; and was, by Mr Campbell, the chief preacher of the "Row Heresy," introduced to the Macdonalds, Mr Erskine, Mr Lusk, Mary Campbell, and the other naturally and supernaturally gifted persons who figured there.

He resided with Mr Campbell, to whose amiable and pious character he bears that testimony, in his sound and sober mind, in which we believe those who differ far from Mr Campbell in religious opinions will heartily concur. Yet the manse of Row was, at this period, a perilous residence for a young man in the condition of Mr Percival. He soon became "almost a convert," and very soon overtopped his part. We have seen his state of preparation before he left Oxford; his fastings and midnight watchings, and exciting "communion" with persons in his own enthusiastic state. At Row, he says—

The effect then may be readily imagined which was produced on a highly excited and enthusiastic mind by the awful thought that I was abiding in the presence and company of persons, in all probability moved and speaking by the Holy Ghost. One afternoon at Row, in the house of a gentleman, where I was at luncheon, I was first called out to see one of the inspired ladies, who had left the table and desired to speak to me, under the impression that she was commanded to address me. She was a plain slender young woman, pitted with the small pox. I attended her in the drawing-room; and, when I was alone with her, with her arm raised, and moving to a kind of serious measure, she addressed me in clear and angelic notes, with sounds like these—"Holla mi hastos, Holla mi hastos, disca, capita, crustos, bustos," &c. &c. &c. She then cried out, "And he led them out to Bethany and said, Tarry ye in Jerusalem until ye are indued with power from on high." . . . I was silent, pondering in my own heart what might be the meaning of the words I had heard, if true, and how I was to obtain a decided explanation of them—whether the command to "tarry in Jerusalem," referred to my remaining amongst the inspired persons in that neighbourhood, or to a state of peace and confidence of mind. Whilst thus reflecting, a new and wonderful sensation came upon me: from my head downwards through my whole frame, I felt a spirit or a humour shedding its benign influence, the effect of which was that of the most cheerful, mild, and grateful peace and quiet. The words it suggested to me were, "Like to the dew of Hermon," &c. &c. I do not remember ever having felt such, and with inward joy and pleasure I thought I recognised the marvellous work of the Almighty. I now suspect that it might have been the effect of excitement on a nervous system already undermined. Yet I look back with pleasure and satisfaction on my recollection of those hours. A mind so harassed, so tortured as mine had been for many years, may well be pardoned for being deceived, by so sensible a delusion; by a Pandora bringing in her box a medicine so suited apparently to my complaint, and so delightful. If a doubt suggested itself, I might naturally reply in the spirit of Camoens, "Ainda eu imagino, em ser contento?" Am I yet only imagining when I am happy?

The mind of the young gentleman had now fairly given way; yet his shattered reason sometimes strove against the delusions by which he was beset; as, in one instance, when he was tempted to laugh at Mr Erskine's prophetic announcement to a party of the fair disciples, waiting, in the rain, for a steam-boat, to pass over to Port-Glasgow, that "he had an impression that a boat would come;" so they need not seek the shelter which Mr Percival, who then left them, had recommended. There might, perhaps, have been a little occasional jealousy among these miraculously-endowed persons as to the superiority of their respective gifts, though Mr Percival was not yet regularly exercising supernatural powers. He even says—

I could not withstand the ridicule excited in my mind by an elderly gentleman thus misleading his flock; for I was convinced that he was mistaken in this instance at least, though I had little question of the doctrines he supported being true. I need not add that they were disappointed.

After this day, I attended the meeting of the followers of the church at Port-Glasgow. Here I heard again a manifestation of tongues, and the Scriptures read with an utterance preternatural, and requiring great assurance to practise, because so extraordinary. I never attended these meetings without great conflict of mind, and afterwards depression. I had an anxiety working in me, and a bond pressing down heavy on me. I knew not what I was to do; my mind was in the dark, yet I wanted to be taking an active part. The sounds I heard were at times beautiful in the extreme, resembling the Greek language; at times they were awfully sublime and grand, and gave me a full perception of that idea, "the Word was with God, and the Word was God:" at times the tone of them was querulous and almost ridiculous.

Mr Percival was now fairly under the influence of the prevailing mania; and the very timidity and modesty of his nature, which struggled against public "manifestations," probably aggravated his mental distemper. The spirit—the spirit of madness, delusion, presumption—was for ever urging him to deliver "messages," and to emit utterances; and he suffered under the feeling that he was grieving and resisting the spirit by his timidity before man.

One night he found courage to address a Laird, imbibing whisky in the travellers' room of an inn at Greenock, and half converted him by singing and extemporizing. He says:—

I could mention several instances of the same kind, when the power of the Spirit came upon me, and, opening my mouth, sang in beautiful tones words of purity, kindness, and consolation. I was subdued and humbled; it was not my doing—the words, the ideas even, were wholly unthought of by me, or at least I was unconscious of thinking of them—

Et quoniam Deus ora movet, acquar ora moventem
Rite Deum—

Ovid's description of the inspiration of Pythagoras tallied with my experience. The voice was given me, but I was not the master of it; I was but the instrument. I could not use it at my command, but solely at the command of the Spirit that guided me.

The madness worked, and must have been apparent to Mr Campbell and his sister; but alas! those who can conjure up such storms in the soul, have often little power to allay the tempest they witness and deplore when too late. He was now a full believer, and he relates:—

At morning service in Mr Campbell's church, one Sunday, I was led to open my mouth, and sing a part of a psalm, at a time when the rest of the congregation were at peace, and whilst Mr Campbell was preparing to preach, I mistrusted the guidance; I knew not what then to do; but after inward conflict, whilst Mr Campbell was actually preaching, I gained confidence to chant two verses of another psalm. I was immediately below, and behind the pulpit. Mr Campbell descended from it to dissuade me, and begged me not to continue. I told him quietly, "I had done." The power had left me. I knew not whether I had done right or wrong; I only knew the power was not mine; and from its nature, as evidenced to my own feelings, I concluded it divine: afterwards, in a conversation with Mary Campbell, I understood that which is written by St Paul, that we are not to speak altogether, but to command the spirits; for that God is not a God of confusion, but of order.

At future stages of his distemper he sometimes recalled the expostulation of Mary Campbell; and in Dublin it had some fleeting power over his conscience and judgment in momentarily causing him to doubt or be ashamed of the part he was acting. He had, so to speak, stray lucid thoughts, though no lucid intervals.

So far as we know, we have said, the progress of a purely religious lunacy was never before more accurately traced. Cowper's first derangement, of which he has given a narrative, was prior to his conversion.

Mr Percival left the manse of Row, his mind completely deranged by what must be called, in part, spiritual pride. He describes his exultation, his doubts, and the superstitious practices by which he was further bewildered. But those really heathen practices—the turning over the leaves of the Bible to ascertain, will of Heaven, as Pagans consulted the Fates, by, among other modes, opening a book—aræ, we believe, defended by some professing Christians, in their sober senses. There is, in truth, a latent tinge of superstition in every human bosom, and Mr Percival was of the character that was peculiarly liable to its influences. There must probably have been something very faulty in his education. He continues his narrative:—

I left the manse at Row, in my own imagination, a living instance of the Holy Ghost operating in man—full of courage, confidence, peace, and rapture, like a glowing flame, but still and submissive. Such, I say, was the state of my feeling in the life of that Spirit; but in the flesh I was anxious lest I should be betrayed into error by a false zeal, or by false directions, so as to turn that power to ridicule, by attempting miracles, uncommanded, or by conduct out of order; at the same time, I was alarmed, lest, mistaking a fear of man for a love of order, I might quench the Holy Spirit working within me. . . . Mr Campbell, at my departure, seemed to fear for me, that I might be misled, and expressed his anxiety; I was conscious of danger and difficulty, but I hoped what had been begun without me, would be perfected in me, despite even of myself.

Before I quitted Row, however, I had suspected that a new power had been conferred on me, of discerning the spirits that spoke in men around me, by their tone, and the effect of the utterance upon my nervous organs. This was a new field of observation to me when I left Scotland, and I considered it might be, if not a delusion, a beneficial guard against any spiritual enemy; but when I came to Ireland, in addition to the power of discerning evil in others, I fancied that I had the power to discern evil in myself, and to know by the sensation on my palate, throat, and hearing, whether I was speaking in accordance with the will of God, or against his will, and consequently against the laws of nature. I now attribute this sensation in a great measure to extreme nervous excitement: but at that time it led to the destruction of my new-formed peace, and ultimately to my ruin.

It was unfortunate that he returned to Dublin at this time, instead of joining his family; though his elder brother also believed in the Row miracles, as he had written to the deluded young man.

In Ireland he mingled chiefly with persons as enthusiastic and excited as himself; and one of them, a clergyman, urged him to assist at a public meeting. The way in which he threw loose the reins of imagination at that meeting, is thus described, and gives us a key to this and similar states of hallucination:—

I decided when there, what line of argument to adopt, in conformity with the will of my singular inspiration; and being at a loss to know how to support my argument with texts, and doubting the will, or mistrusting the power of the Spirit to speak through me uninterruptedly, I applied inwardly for guidance; and the Spirit, moving my arms and fingers, opened for me my Bible in distinct places, one after the other, supplying me in each place with a passage in regular connexion with my line of argument. According to these I spoke.

I mention these facts to shew the reasonableness, if I may so call it, of my lunacy, if it was entirely lunacy; to speak more clearly, to shew the reality of the existence of that power, by the abuse or use of which I became insane. If by the abuse of it, because the Lord confounded me for my disobedience; if by the use of it, because, though real, it was a spirit of delusion.

When Mr Percival argues in this manner he perplexes us, and leaves us in doubt if he is yet altogether himself. His sufferings were deep and real, and his conflict between imaginary inspiration and internal misgiving was accompanied with such extreme nervous irritation and pain, that, exhausted, weary, and broken-hearted, he often wished to forget religion altogether, and be at peace. In the words of Cowper, "day and night he was upon the rack; lying down in horror, and rising up in despair." With this state alternated brief seasons of triumph; though ruin was at hand, and the full mischief of the pernicious errors he had imbibed was about to be completely developed. If not already insane, his mind, it will be admitted, was fearfully shattered.

We could not find better, briefer, nor more delicate language than his own, in which to relate his final lapse. It is enough to indicate it. He fell into bad company, and was confined by illness, aggravated by shame and remorse.

He expresses great pain and difficulty in getting thus far in his sad story. During his confinement, a friendly officer, of moderate and religious principles, with whose family he was intimately acquainted, shewed the greatest regard and attention to him, from being aware of the disturbed state of his mind. To this friend he had related his strange sensations, and guidances, and inspirations. After his convalescence, this gentleman, to divert his imagination from the illusions that preyed upon it, invited him to pass the Sunday evening with his family, hoping that a cheerful hour, spent in the society of old friends, would be soothing to his spirits. It had a quite opposite effect. Humbled and remorseful as he had been at this period, his spiritual presumption was not conquered; in other words, he was insane. He imagined that, as he was about to depart for England, it was his imperative duty to speak in an unknown tongue, and perform miracles before the family, in confirmation of the Row doctrine. He that day fancied that his own rapid recovery had been produced by a miracle!—that day when he must have been in a violent nervous fever. He imagined that he, a spiritual being, had no need of physicians or medicines, and that it was his duty to reject them, to shew on what grounds his cure rested! The state of his perverted mind, and the weakness of human nature and the perversions of delusive faith, are curiously revealed in the following sentence:—

“It is contemptible and ridiculous, but when night came and I had to decide, I split the difference by taking half the dose that my physician had ordered me. The truth is, that I doubted my delusions, and I doubted my physician.

In his friend's house he was in a state of great excitement, increased by the opposition to his attempts at utterances and singing. Among other things, he attempted, or rather wished to put his hand into the fire, to prove that by faith he could draw it out unhurt. But this he did not or was not permitted to do. Indeed, a curious under-current of reason flowed at all times under his wildest illusions, where personal safety or great bodily pain were apprehended. If an impetuous incoherent lunatic he was never so wholly and recklessly frantic as to risk his life. On this night his perceptions seem first to have been disturbed. How touchingly he relates those first aberrations of the senses! How often, in perusing his narrative, has that most piteous cry that ever issued from the human bosom, been recalled to us:—

“Let me not be mad—not mad, sweet Heaven!

Keep me in temper! I would not be mad!”

In the night he awoke under the most fearful impressions. Delirium was fairly begun, and his derangement took the shape that might have been anticipated. As a psychological curiosity, we shall transcribe some of the more remarkable of those first delusions which he entertained, or of which he was made the sport. It is, we feel, difficult to speak of the operations of the deranged mind in intelligible language. Let it be remembered that it is the wild illusions, the dreams of a man awake, that Mr Percival describes, often with the vehement energy of that highest eloquence which true feeling alone inspires, and sometimes rather incoherently. It should, however, be remembered, that, though an educated man, he had not been accustomed to write for the press. He slept in a room of Kilmainham Hospital—probably near his friend's barrack-rooms—and had promised not to cry out in prayer or hymn, lest he should disturb the old pensioners. He seems to have restrained himself for a time; but he awoke, we should say for the time, stark mad. He affirms that his mind was at first sound, “except so far as it (in a certain respect) was deceived by preternatural injunctions.”

In a certain respect, it remained sound throughout my illness, so that it faithfully recorded the objects and the events that took place around me; but I looked to the inspirations I received for the interpretation of them. If at any time my ear could have been closed to my delusions, I was then fit to be at liberty; but the credit I gave to my delusions, rather than to my judgment, was my disease.

We forbear to comment on this reasoning; for no one can peruse this afflicting narrative without feeling the deepest sympathy and tenderness for its author. He relates—

In the night I awoke under the most dreadful impressions; I heard a voice addressing me, and I was made to imagine that my disobedience to the faith, in taking the medicine overnight, had not only offended the Lord, but had rendered the work of my salvation extremely difficult, by its effects upon my spirits and humours. I heard that I could only be saved now by being changed into a spiritual body; and that a great fight would take place in my mortal body between Satan and Jesus; the result of which would either be my perfection in a spiritual body, or my awaking in hell. I am not sure whether before or after this, I was not commanded to cry out aloud, for consenting to which I was immediately rebuked, as unmindful of the promise I had made to my friend. A spirit came upon me and prepared to guide me in my actions. I was lying on my back, and the spirit seemed to light on my pillow, by my right ear, and to command my body. I was placed in a fatiguing attitude, resting on my feet, my knees drawn up and on my head, and made to swing my body from side to side without ceasing. In the meantime, I heard voices without and within me, and sounds as of the clanking of iron, and the breathing of great forge bellows, and the force of flames. I understood that I was only saved by the mercy of Jesus, from seeing, as well as hearing, hell around me; and that if I were not obedient to His spirit, I should inevitably awake in hell before the morning. After some time I had a little rest, and then, actuated by the same spirit, I took a like position on the floor, where I remained, until I understood that the work of the Lord was perfected, and that now my salvation was secured; at the same time the guidance of the spirit left me, and I became in doubt what next I was to do. I understood that this provoked the Lord, as if I was affecting ignorance when I knew what I was to do, and, after some hesitation, I heard the command, to “take your position on the floor again then,” but I had no guidance or no perfect guidance to do so, and could not resume. I was told, however, that my salvation depended upon my maintaining that position as well as I could until the morning; and, oh! great was my joy when I perceived the first brightness of the dawn, which I could scarcely believe had arrived so early. I then retired to bed. I had imagined during the night that the fire of hell was consuming my mortal body—that the Spirit of Jesus came down to me to endure the pain thereof for me, that he might perfect in me a spiritual body to His honour and glory. I imagined that the end of this work was, that I was already in the state of one raised from the dead; and that any sin or disobedience in this body was doubly horrible and loathsome, inasmuch as it was in a body actually regenerated and clothed upon with the Holy Ghost. I imagined also that the Holy Ghost had in a special manner descended, and worked with Jesus to save me. I considered it a proof of the truth of my imaginations, when on rising, being perplexed by two different guidings that came upon me, I looked down upon my limbs which were white and of a natural colour; and again I looked down on my limbs, when one half of my frame appeared in a state of scarlet inflammation. When I went to dress, this had again subsided.

Before I rose from my bed, I understood that I was now to proceed through the world as an angel, under the immediate guidance of the Lord, to proclaim the tidings of his second coming. With that came an uncertain impression that I was to do this in an extraordinary way, and by singing—and this idea haunted me throughout my changes of insanity. I had also an uncertain impression of a like nature, that I was to go and shew myself before the Lord Lieutenant or the General of the Forces, that I was to breakfast there, and to meet, either at the Lord Lieutenant's a prince of the blood royal, or at the General's, a duke, to whom I was to proclaim the near coming of the Lord.

The delirium, of which we have so vivid a picture, worked. He proceeds:—

My whole conduct became confused, my language ambiguous and doubtful. After breakfast, I prayed to be left alone, which was accorded with some difficulty. When alone in the breakfast room, I expected to be guided to prayer; but a spirit guided me and placed me on a chair, in a constrained position, with my head turned to look at the clock, the hand of which I saw proceeding to the first quarter. I understood I was to leave the position when it came to the quarter: when, however, it came to the quarter, I was anxious to be on the safe side, and I waited till it was at least half a minute past. Having done this, I was not a whit the wiser; but on the contrary, I felt that I had again offended by my want of exact punctuality, proving my want of confidence. I was then directed to lie on the floor, with my face to the ground, in an attitude of supplication and humiliation. I heard a spirit pray in me, and reason in me, and with me, and ultimately, another spirit, desiring certain gifts of the Holy Spirit to be given me, amongst which prophecy, tongues, miracles, and discernment of spirits; soon after I was overwhelmed with a sudden and mighty conviction of my utter worthlessness; and being asked how I could expect the Lord to take me, and on what conditions I craved his favour; another spirit cried out in me, and for me, "Lord! take me as I am."

His friend carried him to his lodgings in Dublin in a hackney coach, and sent for his physician. Now he wished to set off for England; and he became exceedingly irritated when a stout man, stationed at the chamber door, prevented him from going out. He prayed to be allowed to pass, and failing, tried his miraculous powers. How pernicious must be those extravagant opinions which at least strongly tended to upset the reason of this poor gentleman, and led to a scene like this:—

He [the keeper] was not a whit shaken by my address, so, after again and again adjuring him, by the desire of the spirit whose word I heard, I seized one of his arms, desiring it to wither: my words were idle, no effect followed, and I was ashamed and astonished.

Then, thought I, I have been made a fool of! But I did not on that account mistrust the doctrines by which I had been exposed to this error. The doctrines, thought I, are true; but I am mocked at by the Almighty for my disobedience to them, and at the same time, I have the guilt and the grief of bringing discredit upon the truth, by my obedience to a spirit of mockery, or by my disobedience to the Holy Spirit; for there were not wanting voices to suggest to me, that the reason why the miracle had failed, was, that I had not waited for the Spirit to guide my action when the word was spoken, and that I had seized the man's arm with the wrong hand. I was silent and astonished. Bed-time came. I requested the man to leave me for half an hour for prayer; he did so. Before that, I think Captain H. had been to me, and had explained the reason of his being there. I went to bed, but not to sleep.

In after years, when reflecting upon the injudicious treatment which, as he imagines, exacerbated his distemper, and which, from a state of temporary hallucination, threw him into confirmed lunacy, Mr Percival blames the coercive steps taken by his well-meaning friend, as rash and indelicate. But there is much in all such cases to justify even excess of caution, and prompt coercive interference, for the safety of the patient. The dreadful catastrophe of Mr Whitbread and of Sir Samuel Romilly have, perhaps, contributed, in this country, to over-haste in the adoption of those measures, which, however needful, must always irritate the patient. But an awful responsibility is laid upon friends and relatives in all such cases; and, upon the whole, it may be believed that their affection and natural feelings will prevent them from frequently erring in the too hasty adoption of restraint. Yet how touching and painful is this poor sufferer's complaint, in looking back upon the dark vista through which he had passed:—

I trace my ruin to the particular trials, to the surprise, the confusion, the puzzle, which the sudden intrusion of a keeper brought upon me. But at that time, unfortunately, I did not consider my dignity so much as my relationship to the Almighty, as his redeemed servant, bound in gratitude, and from self-abasement, to exercise forbearance and humility. If it be replied, My ruin might have been brought about another way; I answer, I do not know what might have been, but I know what did take place.

The first symptoms of my derangement were, that I gazed silently on the medical men who came to me, and resolutely persisted in acts apparently dangerous. No doubt, there were also symptoms of bodily fever; but from that moment to the end of my confinement, men acted as though my body, soul, and spirit were fairly given up to their control, to work their mischief and folly upon. My silence, I suppose, gave consent. I mean, that I was never told, such and such things we are going to do; we think it advisable to administer such and such medicine, in this or that manner; I was never asked, Do you want anything? (Do you wish for, or prefer anything? Have you any objection to this or to that? I was fastened down in bed; a meagre diet was ordered for me; this and medicine were forced down my throat, or in the contrary direction: my will, my wishes, my repugnances, my habits, my delicacy, my inclinations, my necessities, were not once consulted, I may say thought of. I did not find the respect paid usually even to a child.

It was now that, he contends, his mind was in many respects sound; and it is, at least, certain that his perceptions were not yet wholly disturbed. His complaints of the superintendents of the celebrated Lunatic Asylum near Bath, where he was afterwards placed, are far more bitter than of the Dublin physicians; and, without pretending to decide the point, we must acknowledge that, at least, some of them appear reasonable, and all most deserving the attention of those who undertake the most delicate and difficult of human offices—the combined medical and moral treatment of the insane. It is, we think, Pinel, the celebrated French writer on mental disease, who remarks—“None ought to meddle with the mad who have not discretion, and genius into the bargain;” ay, and with knowledge and experience, the devotedness of brotherly love.

Mr Percival neither directly gives his own name nor that of Dr Fox; but however proper in him this gauzy concealment, to the public that delicacy is superfluous which really hides nothing. The scene of his sufferings, and of his partial recovery, cannot be mistaken.—We return to his delusions, before animadverting on his treatment in the asylum in England, to which he was transferred. On the night that he was first placed under the care of the keeper in Dublin, he slept none, and tossed all night in the wildest delirium, repeating the fantastic or harlequin evolutions of the former night, to redeem himself, as he imagined, and to get rid of the spirits of blasphemy and mockery. He was prompted to take means to break his neck; but here, as in other instances, he was cautious of seriously endangering his life. The presence of the keeper disturbed him exceedingly; and if it be possible that but for that he could, as he says, have slept, it is greatly to be lamented. The man seized him, and prevented his evolutions. He adds:—

I tore myself from him, telling him it was necessary for my salvation; he left me and went down stairs. I then tried to perform what I had begun; but now I found, either that I could not so jerk myself round on my head, or that my fear of breaking my neck was really too strong for my faith. In that case I then certainly mocked, for my efforts were not sincere.

When I undertook this action, I imagined that if I performed it in the power of the Holy Spirit, no harm would result to me, but that if I threw myself round to the right in my own strength, I might break my neck and die, but that I should be raised again immediately to fulfil my mission. I had therefore no design to destroy myself.

Such were, at least in part, the practical fruits of the miraculous manifestations at Row. The mind of this unfortunate gentleman seems occasionally still to waver when he recalls these horrors, and his own abandonment; and surely the less he now dwells upon them the better. He must have been consuming with fever and thirst; and the workings of his frenzy took the same form which certain bodily sensations are said to produce in dreams. His mouth was probably parched, and he was then tempted to expectorate violently, to get rid of the evil spirits; and to drink water in order to satisfy the Almighty. He got no water. The keeper had gone out for a strait-waistcoat and an assistant, and he was at once bound in it; but still attempting the feat of standing on his head, he was also tied to the bed-posts by the legs. It might, perhaps, have been better to have suffered him to continue his harlequin tricks, until he tired, than to have used all at once violent coercive measures; yet who can say?

Mr Percival attempts to account for how he became the victim of these absurd delusions; for even to Row he came prepared by a long train of causes; though the mad scenes there certainly awakened the slumbering mischief. He wonders how, with so much sense and reflection remaining, he could have been so deluded; but persons sane, or seemingly sane, on every other point—some of whom went about their ordinary avocations—were similarly deluded. Mr Percival is not the first to have acknowledged that it was all delusion! But, excepting poor Irving, who fell the sacrifice to his own vain-glory, and the extraordinary conflict of truth, and doubt, and positive insincerity, in a mind powerful and weak by turns, there has been no such victim. In Mr Percival, there was no alloy of insincerity. Our sympathy with him is untroubled even by a doubt. When he went to Row, prepared to receive the contagion into every vein, he tells—

The spirits which at first spoke in my hearing, or addressed me at Row and Port-Glasgow, and afterwards spoke in me and moved me; which subsequently in Ireland I heard talking to me, and communing with me invisible; had an utterance so pure, so touching, so beautiful, that I could not but believe them divine. They spake also in accordance with the word of life; they directed me in paths of peace, obedience, and humility; they flattered me even in my desire to adhere to the church establishment, and not to break the visible unity of the church; they came upon me to teach me method and order; they guided my hand to write in letters unusual to me; in so many ways they were attested, as spirits of good and of wisdom, that, now even, I dare not deny the possibility of disobedience to them, not my obedience, having caused me to be confounded, which was forewarned me in Scotland. But when I had thrown myself away, and I was thrown away; I was decoyed and separated from Jesus, the rock of a Christian's salvation, by my reliance on these sounds.

The doctrine of the Assurance of Faith is, or was, one of the heresies alleged against the Rowites by the Church of Scotland; and one (among others) for entertaining which Mr Campbell was thrust beyond its pale. This tenet was another stumbling-block in the way of Mr Percival. He feared to doubt; and, on this head, he now speaks very rationally:—

I perished from an habitual error of mind, common to many believers, and particularly to our brethren the Roman Catholics—that of fearing to doubt, and of taking the guilt of doubt upon my conscience. The consequence of this is, want of candour and of real sincerity; because we force ourselves to say we believe what we do not believe, because we think doubt sinful. Whereas we cannot control our doubts, which can only be corrected by information. To reject persuasion wilfully is one crime; but to declare wilfully that we believe what we doubt, or presumptuously that our doubts are wilful, is another.

The strait-waistcoat at midnight was followed by the visit of the mad-doctor in the morning, and the patient's fate, perhaps necessarily, was sealed. He complains grievously of the treatment he underwent in the strait-waistcoat,—tied hand and foot in bed, and shut up in a small close room. He minutely describes his mental and bodily sensations and condition. Some of his delusions, while thus bound hand and foot, and tossing, in the fever of his mind, are absolutely appalling. He was panting for water, to obtain which he struggled to leave his bed, though he did not or could not ask for it; and once he got some; but his most powerful motive for getting up was to reach to the window—

To see if it were true, as my tormentors told me, that all my family were there waiting to receive me, and to hail me as an obedient servant of the Lord Jesus, and a willing martyr to his glory. For when I began to lose all command of my imagination, I was made to believe, that in consequence of my disobedience and blasphemies against Jesus Christ and the Holy Spirit, the Roman Catholics in Ireland, to whom I had been ordained as an angel, being miraculously informed like the shepherds, by an angel shining in the glory of the Lord, had risen up and come to Dublin, demanding my crucifixion or my burning; that in the meantime the Almighty, provoked by my great perfidy and ingratitude, had cut short the days and revoked his counsels; had determined to visit my nation with severe plagues, and me with all the torments he had reserved for Satan, whom, even, he had pardoned, glad to find one, and one only, who deserved all his everlasting plagues, and to be able thereby to pardon his immense creation.

I was the one only being to be eternally damned, alone, in multiplied bodies, and in infinite solitude and darkness and torments. I was told also that the Almighty in His three persons had descended upon earth, had entered London, and had revealed all these things to the King, who was also preparing on earth the most cruel torments for me; that my father and a sister who is now no more, had been raised from the dead, and had interceded for me, and that my relations and friends had assembled round me in Dublin, and had defended me from the violence of the mob at the sacrifice of their own lives. My friend Captain H.'s coat which occasionally lay upon my sofa, for he was constantly attending upon me, was, to my delirious imagination, a proof of his murder in my defence. I was agonized, and often attempted to rush to the window and to present myself to the mob, and to save the lives of my friends, by my own sacrifice; at other times, to satisfy my curiosity, to see if my family and relations were really there. For I had a species of doubts; but no one who has not been deranged, can understand how dreadfully true a lunatic's insane imagination appears to him, how slight his sane doubts.

When I lay upon my pillow, a demand was made of me to suffocate myself on my pillow; that if I would do that in obedience to the Lord's Spirit, it would be an act of obedience, as grateful to him as any other I had been commanded. This delusion haunted me for many months. I imagined that I should be really suffocated, but saved from death, or raised from death, by miraculous interposition. I pressed my mouth and nostrils against the pillow; and I was to attend to the voices that came to me, directing my thoughts, and each tempting me to rise before I had executed the Lord's intention.

Night after night, and day after day, I was summoned to try it again and again till I should succeed, under the most awful penalties. I was told, that it was necessary for the perfection of the glorified man. That all the world had done it but me; that even my sisters had done it, that they had all done it repeatedly for my sake, to put off my damnation, because it was necessary that the commands of the Lord should be fulfilled when once spoken, and they hoped in time that I should do it by their aid. When I felt the chill of the outward air upon my neck under the bedclothes, I was told these were spirits of my sisters, breathing on me to cool me, and encouraging me to go through with my task.

We submit to medical men whether the sensations described below were real or illusory, for by this time Mr P.'s perceptions were, we think, often erroneous. Cowper describes an extraordinary sensation in his brain, analogous to that described here. The spirits were, by his fancy, upbraiding the unhappy patient, that, through cowardice and want of fortitude he would not fulfil the command of the Almighty, while whole Creations were suffering, waiting the concluding act of his obedience! He relates:—

At last, one hour, under an excess of chilling horror at my imagined loss of honour, I was unable to prevent the surrender of my judgment. The act of mind I describe, was accompanied with the sound of a slight crack, and the sensation of a fibre breaking over the right temple; it reminded me of the mainstay of a mast giving way; it was succeeded by a loss of control over certain of the muscles of my body, and was immediately followed by two other cracks of the same kind, one after the other, each more towards the right ear, followed by an additional relaxation of the muscles, and accompanied by an apparently additional surrender of the judgment. In fact, until now, I had retained a kind of restraining power over my thoughts and belief; I now had none; I could not resist the spiritual guilt and contamination of any thought, of any suggestion. My will to choose, to think orderly, was entirely gone. I became like one awake yet dreaming, present to the world in body, in spirit at the bar of heaven's judgment seat; or in hell, enduring terrors unutterable, by the preternatural menaces of everlasting and shocking torments; inexpressible anguish and remorse, from exaggerated accusations of my ingratitude, and a degrading and self-loathing sense of moral turpitude from accusations of crimes I had never committed.

False perceptions, or a state wavering between the true and false, and preternatural visions, followed these paroxysms, or alternated with them. At one time he saw the pale hand and arm of Death stretching over the bed. Sometimes he was told (by the spirits) to try to think coherently, and, when he made the attempt, he was told he did nothing but "ruminate, ruminate."

A moving light was given me, as a guide to know when I was ruminating or reflecting. It was a white light, and used to move in a circle from left to right upon the top of my bed. When I began to ruminate, it turned backwards to the left. Then my Saviour, or his angel's spirit, used to pray me to reflect, in order by any means to regain power over the muscles of my countenance. I say my Saviour or his angel, because, when I imagined that I was in hell, that voice came to me, as the chief servant of Jesus in hell, directing and appointing the times and order of punishment and trial. I used also to hear a beautiful voice, that sung in the most tender, pure, and affecting notes these words, "Keep looking to Jesus, the author and finisher of thy salvation! Oh, keep looking—keep looking to Jesus!" Continually over the head of the bed, at the left-hand side, as if in the ceiling, there was a sound as the voice of many waters, and I was made to imagine that the jets of gas, that came from the fireplace on the left-hand side, were the utterance of my Father's spirit, which was continually within me, attempting to save me; and continually obliged to return to be purified in hell fire, in consequence of the contamination it received from my foul thoughts. I make use of the language I heard. From the ceiling in front of my bed, I used to hear the decrees of what are called the assembly of counsellors, often ushered in these terms:—

The will of Jehovah, the Lord, is supreme—
He will be obeyed, and thou must worship him!

The word of the Lord came from the left-hand side of the ceiling of the room, and many spirits assailed me from all quarters.

When I make use of these words, ceiling of the room, it will appear surprising, that the visions or sounds had such effect upon me, when sensible objects were present, and recognised by me. But I understood these things in a contrary sense. Besides, in part seeing the white and flowing beards, and venerable countenances, I imagined I was really present to them; and that my not acknowledging it was a delusion, an obstinate resistance of the divine will on my part. That, of the two, the appearance of the bed, walls, and furniture, was false, not my preternatural impressions.

His previous irregular course of study might have contributed to the general disorder of his faculties; for his mind was one wild chaos, made up of the fragments of systems—of portions of all faiths and all philosophies. Thomas-a-Kempis, Berkley, Pythagoras, and the Heathen mythology, blended with the most mystical and visionary of those doctrines that have been hung upon the Christian faith, were jumbled together in his delusions. He had been, according to the belief imbibed at Row, changed into a spiritual body; hence he possessed ubiquity. In soberer seasons he had pondered the doctrine of the Communion of Saints, to which he attributed a very different meaning from that generally understood. He had been led to question—

Whether, if we were in the spirit of God, we might not actually know and feel, each what the other was thinking about, or enduring, in various parts of the known world. That which had been a speculation, was now an act of faith; and I imagined I could be in hell, on earth, and in heaven, at the same moment: nay, that I was, and that I witnessed all three states of existence; but that I did not see clearly the two extremes, because I would not acknowledge it to myself.

Even the new-fangled doctrines of Phrenology mingled in the chaos, and aided his lunacy; and he knocked his head against the wall, when chained up in the asylum, on the part where the bump of Secretiveness is assumed to be, under an idea that, if his efforts could knock in the organ, he would thus obliterate the secrets of his guilt, and spare his tortured conscience its agony. And this, for aught we know, was reasoning soundly, upon phrenological principles. Mr Percival, at least, succeeded in seriously hurting his ear which required surgical treatment; though he attributes part of the injury done his ear, to the blows of the keepers. The fanciful and ingenious madman or dreamer imagined that the blood which flowed from his wounded ear was caused by the lachrymatory duct being full of tears of blood, which he could not weep, and which escaped by the ear.

Nothing is more singular than the way in which sounds and other objects of sense, acting upon him, affected his mind and created illusion. One day the tones of a hurdy-gurdy, which he seems to have heard, and which, it is probable, he actually did hear, appeared, he tells, to flit round him, playing a tune which affected him with extreme anguish.

It seemed to remind me of all that I had experienced and forgotten of my heavenly Father's care and love towards me. My mind, amidst other scenes, was transported back to Portugal—to a day when I had passed through Alhandra on horseback, on my way to visit the lines of Torres Vedras, in company with three brother officers. It appeared to me, as if that day a little Portuguese beggar boy had been playing on a hurdy-gurdy in the street; but, to my imagination, now, it was connected also with a time of life when I had in person lived at Alhandra, a beggar, orphan boy.

His early history, as this beggar boy, was made out to him in horrible characters. Among his other crimes, while the Portuguese boy, was plunging a pig alive in boiling water, after tying up its mouth to prevent its cries from being heard. He gives this singular view of the sequence of a madman's ideas, or of the train of horrid phantasms which take the place of rational thought in a lunatic's fancy. It reads like a hideous dream.

This strange tale was revealed to me, accompanied with an impression of recollection of identity with my own experience, as strongly as that by which any of the delusions of Pythagoras may have convinced him. I remember I was first desired to recollect that portion of my life; and when I could not, the sounds of the hurdy-gurdy were sent to me, as the voice said, to quicken my memory. I still had difficulty to collect any ideas, except my passing through Alhandra, my seeing the church on the right hand, and perhaps a young boy with a hurdy-gurdy in the street or market-place. But an indescribable sense of compunction, and of active interest in the place, wrung my feelings; and I was desired to recollect it as the place of my nativity.

I then heard a voice singing to the air of music—

“I do not remember the hour and the day,
But I do remember the day and the hour,
When I was a little boy.”

My difficulty of recollecting was charged on my wilfulness; and so I understood the two first lines, that I would not, not that I could not, remember; and this partly from compunction at the crimes I had committed on my patrons; partly from a sense of shame and guilt at the revelation of the acts of the monks of Aldobaça, which I imagined were being exposed in the presence of my fellow-countrymen, especially in that of the Duke of Wellington, and the officers of my battalion; which also I was considered responsible for, although at the same time living in England in another body, in the discharge of my military duties.

When I inwardly expostulated, and stated that, when I was alive in England, I had not been aware of the union existing between me at the age of twenty-one, and a boy in Portugal of the age of seventeen, I was made to understand that an act of ingratitude in childhood had effaced from my mind the consciousness of this mystery, but that every individual besides me had experienced and delighted in this ubiquity of existence; and even that my brothers and sisters had been living in Portugal at the same time, and had then been acquainted with me, and, living in England, had been conscious of that acquaintance, but could not talk to me concerning it, by reason of my moral darkness through sin.

There was a horrid idea connected with this frenzy, that, in like manner as I had boiled the pig alive, I should be plunged into a huge copper of boiling water, and should be whirled round in it on my back, with my mouth covered over with sackcloth, bubbling, and boiling, and drowning, and suffocating for ever, and ever, and ever! My eyes were also to be taken out of my head, and I yet spiritually, see them hanging over me, looking down upon me, and pursuing me round the cauldron. To add to my horrors, my dearest friends would plunge me in, and stand by ridiculing and tormenting. I actually believed that a sound I heard in the room next to mine, like to boiling water, was a preparation for this awful punishment, and that my brother and one of my cousins were every moment on the eve of plunging me in, and condemning me for ever. When they came into my room, I saw them at times like natural men; but at times their countenances appeared horribly swollen, and their faces darkened so that they looked black. Then I was told that I was not doing my duty to the Lord Jehovah supremely omnipotent, and that they appeared as the angels of hell, already prepared to execute the purposes of his wrath; but that I was always respited, in hope of my future obedience. My feelings were dreadful.

On one of these occasions I recollect saying to my brother, “—, I am desired to tell you, you are a hypocrite.” A voice had commanded me, ‘This was one of the few sentences I addressed to any living being about me.

By the common illusion of lunatics, he accused himself of the most incredible crimes; and, among others, of having assisted in drowning an old woman in the Thames, below Blackfriar's Bridge. Some of his hallucinations were of a happier character. Sometimes he was invited by the spirits to come up "to heavenly places," as he terms them; and whatever was agreeable to his senses seems to have been "heavenly places;" sometimes, also, he saw on the bed-curtains three faces—that of his Saviour, his natural father, and his Almighty Father, which we mention to introduce this singular passage—

But the vision which made the most vivid impression upon me, amounting to reality; so strong an impression indeed, that I might almost say, the possibility of being present in two places at the same time may be capable of realization; thine it was, O Lord, to interpret it to me. When I saw the venerable countenance of my father bending over me weeping, and the crystal tears falling, which I felt trickling down my shoulders, the impression of this was so vivid, that I can hardly help now suspecting, either that water was dropped on my back through the ceiling and tester of the bed, or that I was not where I appeared to be. Still it was not altogether the countenance of my father, as on earth; and I saw a long flowing white beard. I thought, could my father's beard have been so white and so long? but I both thought it unholy to question, and besides I could not control my thoughts to unravel my ideas. So my doubts took slight hold on my reason.

Glimmerings of the reason, not wholly extinguished, sometimes shone through the obscurity of his mind. Three of the housekeepers he imagined to be each his mother; but then, though he received three mothers, he would question how his mother came to be there, poor and a menial. Even in dreams the same thing is done. At one time he saw a vision, intended, as he understood, to convey an idea, or make an exhibition, of the mechanism of the human mind.

To return to his real history:—Ill-treated in Dublin, as he argues that he was, he was hurried away from it so soon as he was imagined fit to endure the journey, and was again thrown into a state of violent excitement. Properly treated, he imagines that he might have been speedily restored. We have seen the means adopted; let us now hear the opinion of the patient, seven years later, when he had long been convalescent: for he began to recover towards the end of the same year, or even earlier, though, from an unfortunate misunderstanding with his family, and other causes, he was long kept under some sort of restraint. The opinions of this unfortunate gentleman on his own case are, at all events, well entitled to be heard, not more for his sake than for that of every one liable to the same dismal malady.

It may be asked me, what course I would have had pursued towards me, seeing there was such evident danger in leaving me at liberty? I answer, that my conduct ought to have been tried in every situation compatible with my state; that I ought to have been dressed, if I would not dress myself; that I should have been invited to walk up and down my room, if not quietly, in the same confinement as in bed; that, whilst those implements that might do me hurt were removed, pens, pencils, books, &c., should have been supplied to me; that I should have been placed in a hackney coach, and driven for air and exercise, towards the sea-shore, and round the outskirts of Dublin. Few can imagine the sense of thirst and eager desire for freshness of air, which the recollection of that time yet excites in me. I do not recollect water having been presented to me; if it was, I systematically refused it, like everything else; and it was not forced on me like the medicine and broth. If I recollect correctly, I got some water after my brother's arrival, and he also brought me once some grapes, a few of which I ate in spite of my false conscience; and God knows how refreshing they were.

He was taken to the Bristol packet, and tells, whilst standing on the quay, I recognised a poor Irish lad, who used to hold my horse, and to do commissions for me; he had watched for me, and followed me, to see me embark. I could not express my feelings; but as he stood chill and shivering a little way off, there was an expression of distrust in his features; and I felt as if he were a truer friend than those occupied about my person.

We should mention that, with the tenderest feelings for his mother, Mr Percival still shews resentment to his brothers; or, if not resentment, disapprobation of their conduct to him. He became violently affected; imagined that the ship and the whole crew were to be sunk on account of his sins; and, not allowed to go on the deck, he called aloud to his brother to warn him. His brother tried to joke with him on his illusions. It may sometimes exasperate the insane to reason with them, though at other times it is found useful; while patient explanation, and delicacy in ordinary intercourse, as if they were still human and rational beings, however eclipsed their faculties may be for the time, are generally found useful: but it is ticklish work to joke with the mad, and to treat them with anything bordering on levity, or even as children; much less with contempt, or disregard of their previous habits and feelings. The storm, which was about to engulf them all, as he imagined, had a fearful reality to the patient, who might also have been under the influence of personal fear. He called loudly for the captain; and attempted to rush on deck to give him warning. He was, of necessity we must allow, overpowered by the keeper, and handcuffed. The "Spirit" whispered, it was his duty to kill this man who held him; and he struck at him with his manacled hands. The Spirit still accused him of indifference to the fate of the crew—indifference become more dreadful, from the idea that his brothers, and many of his family, who had come to Dublin to be sacrificed for him, were all on deck, ready to perish through his slothful neglect and stubborn refusal to exercise his miraculous power for their preservation. The servant at last got leathern cases on his arms; and though judgment assents, one's heart aches and bleeds to read—"And I was compelled to be the passive object of the tortures of my imagination."

When they landed at Bristol he was, by medical advice, put to bed; delivered up the prey to new and torturing delusions. Let any one realize, as far as is possible, the condition of this gentleman in the packet, and again in the following scene, and imagine what madness is; and the guilt of those who directly or indirectly contribute to throw a fellow-creature into this state, or to protract his sufferings under it. When they had landed in safety, his mind recovered momentarily from its horrid delusions; but then the notion came that all around was a vision; that the ship had really foundered; and that the crew had prayed to suffer death to avert his punishment. The doctor we have told sent him to bed, and he says—

I would have given my hand to remain up; my bed was a scene of horrors to me. However, I made no reply, and to bed I went. I was scarcely in bed when I became a prey to new delusions. It was snowing at the time. I was told that a dreadful winter was to fall upon the country, on account of my sin. I was told that Bristol was on fire, and made to see flames; that the house was to fall and destroy every one in it; and this, all for my sin. My brother was sitting in the room with me. I expected every moment to see the walls crush him. I warned him to go away, for that the house was going to fall. I told him I saw the town in flames. He naturally made light of what I said. He recollected my words afterwards when the riots were in the town. I was told that the reason he did not believe me was, that I did not address him in the tongue given to me; I was rebuked and upbraided for it. I essayed again, but I met with the same rebukes. I lost all patience. Again I was ordered to suffocate myself, and to kick about in various postures in the bed; unless I did so, that Satan would enter me, and that then my Saviour must endure in me fresh torments, to rescue my soul from hell. For though Satan was redeemed, yet he could only be my most skilful tormentor and destroyer, if I were not redeemed too, and delight also in his office, if I were at last reprobate. It seemed to me that Satan's spirit came to the left side of my bed and entered my body, and that I allowed it, for that I was so teased that I delighted in the prospects of my Saviour's sufferings; immediately afterwards I was seized with compunction and dread.

The spirits also told me that a dinner would be brought to me; that some Irish stew had been ordered for me by my brother, which it was intended I should eat; but that a fowl would be sent me from heavenly places to tempt me, which I was to refuse. It was not the first time I had heard the like from the Spirits, nor was it the last.

I did not understand what this meant, but I became very hungry. After some time the door opened, and a servant came in with the dish, containing a boiled fowl, which appeared very large and plump. I looked for the Irish stew, but it did not appear; the fowl on being brought near appeared small and meagre, and again plump, and twice its former size. The spirits then—to my inward observation that there was but one dish—replied, that it was resolved to tempt me by a dish of the same kind, to make my trial more easy; that a fowl had been ordered for me on earth, as well as the fowl in heavenly places; because it was supposed I would at least consent to relinquish the second for the salvation of my soul, and the happiness of so many thousands interested in me; when I might eat the other. However the humour came upon me that I would dine in heavenly places as I called it, and I could not resist it; and yet it was with my will. For, after what I have related as having occurred in Dublin, I had no power to restrain my will, my capidity, my avidity, from moral contamination; nay, the more I attempted to resist contamination, the more my power over my will seemed to evade me: besides this, there was a difficulty in obeying the commands given to me, because, even whilst eating the fowl, I was puzzled by the change in its appearance, and told, “now you must refuse it because you are in heavenly places, now you may eat it because you are on earth, according as it appeared” beautiful or common.

Next day he was committed to the care of Dr Fox. He describes every circumstance of his introduction most minutely, and, we dare say, accurately, for his memory seems quite as faithful to his delusions as to his true perceptions. The man who took his portmanteau and afterwards waited upon him, and laid the cloth for his solitary dinner, he, on the bidding of the Spirits, called Zachary Gibbs. The man's real name was Samuel Hobbs; and the patient afterwards named him, as a spiritual body, HERMINE HERBERT; and fancied him at once his Saviour, Zachary Gibbs, and Hermine Herbert. On seeing the linen of Hobbs marked S. H., he received a further confirmation that he was the Saviour, these initial letters standing for Salvator Hominum.* His mind at this time seems to have been like moonshine on water. All was vague and mysterious: only human yearnings remained true. He tells—

I understood that, on certain conditions, I was to go home, which was all I desired, whilst on certain other conditions I was to be left here. The spirits told me this.

After dinner, a raspberry tartlet or two were brought to table; they appeared to be very large, clean, and beautiful, and I was told they were sent to me from heavenly places; that I was to refuse them; that they were sent to try me; that if I refused them, I should be doing my duty, and my brother would take me to E—.† The same humour came on me to eat them all the quicker, under the idea that they had given me nothing but slops and physic for a fortnight or more, and now, if they are such fools as to bring me up into heavenly places, I'll make the best of it. My brother again went out, and I did not see him enter any more—this pained me exceedingly; I thought at least he would have bid me adieu; but the spirits told me that he was so disgusted at seeing me eating the tarts, when he knew that if I could only have refused one I should have been allowed by the Almighty to return to my mother and family, and that I knew it, that he had resolved to leave me without bidding adieu, and had given me up into the hands of the Almighty. I imagine now his abrupt departure was preconcerted, for fear of any opposition on my part.

Well, my brother went, and I was left amongst strangers.

If I had had any introduction to Dr F., at least I was unconscious of it. I was left to account for my position in that asylum—for I was in Dr F.'s asylum—to the working of my own, and be it recollected, a lunatic imagination.

My spirits told me that I was in the house of an old

* He had a variety of HERMINE HERBERTS. One of them, a keeper, named Marshall, he called his SIMPLICITY; another of the numerous Hermine he named Kill-all. Another he fancied an old servant of his father's, raised from the dead to attend him. Among the patients was a Captain P., whom he named his Spirit of family pride; a Captain N. was the Spirit of joviality; a quaker patient was his Spirit of simplicity; and one of the ladies of the family, his Spirit of repentance. Some he fancied his brothers and uncles, sisters, cousins, and old schoolfellows; and the countenances of those about him were ever changing. He was always trying to prostrate himself at the feet of those he imagined the Almighty or the Saviour, to whom his intense prayer was to be taken home; because all about him was “so strange, new, and perplexing.” We mention these absurdities to elucidate the first symptoms of returning reason, the state between sleep and waking, when he began to doubt the Spirits; and when they began singing, “You are in a lunatic asylum, if you will”—“If not, you are in such and such places.”—“That is Samuel Hobbs, if you will; if not, it is Hermine Herbert, the Saviour,” &c. Other delusions of a milder character succeeded before they finally fled altogether.

friend of my father's, where certain duties were expected of me; that I knew what those duties were, but I pretended ignorance, because I was afraid of the malice and persecution of the world in performing them. . . . I was put to bed with my arms fastened. Either that night or the next, the heavy leathern cases were taken off my arms, to my great delight, and replaced by a strait waistcoat. The night brought to me my usual torments, but I slept, during part of it, sounder and better than before. In the morning I recollect observing a book of manuscript prayers, and a prayer-book or Bible bound in blue morocco; the impression on my feelings was very dreary, and as if I had been imprisoned for a crime or for debt; but I was occupied, as usual, with the agony of mind occasioned by the incomprehensible commands, injunctions, insinuations, threats, taunts, insults, sarcasms, and pathetic appeals of the voices round me. . . . I was not now aware that I was lunatic, nor did I admit this idea until the end of the year. . . . I imagined, at the same time, that I was placed here "to be taught of the spirits," that is, (for they all spoke in different keys, tones, and measures, imitating usually the voices of relations or friends,) to learn what was the nature of each spirit that spoke to me, whether a spirit of fun, of humour, of sincerity, of honesty, of honour, of hypocrisy, of perfect obedience, or what not, and to acquire knowledge to answer to the suggestions or arguments of each, as they in turn addressed me, or to choose which I would obey.

For instance, whilst eating my breakfast, different spirits assailed me, trying me. One said, eat a piece of bread for my sake, &c., &c.; another, at the same time, would say, refuse it for my sake, or, refuse that piece for my sake, and take that; others, in like manner, would direct me to take or refuse my tea. I could seldom refuse one without disobeying the other; and, to add to my disturbance of mind at these unusual phenomena, and at the grief of mind, and at times alarm, I appeared to feel at disobeying any, Zachary Gibbs stood by my bed-side in a new character.

What are all the poetic or idly-feigned confessions, of fictitious personages, to these wild realities?

One could fancy that, in Mr Percival's hallucinations and imaginative flights, one might often trace his previous serious or lighter course of reading. A mixture of allegory and euphuism is predominant in the fantastic names that he gave to the other patients in the asylum, and to the servants and medical men. With his continual visions and phantasms, we shall not meddle farther. His condition soon became much worse. He was impetuous and must have appeared malignant; and it was thought necessary to use violent coercive measures; of which, and of many alleged indignities, neglects, and insults he complains. It must, however, be observed, that he recovered under this treatment; though he left the asylum, or was taken away, (at his own earnest desire,) while still apparently in a condition which made one of the doctors, at parting, remark, he says maliciously, "Good bye, Mr Percival; I wish I could give you hopes of your recovery." This was, to say the least, a cruel and an unnecessary speech, to a man in his condition. He did recover; he will say, in spite of the doctors; we give no opinion.

When first brought to the asylum, he was taken to a small parlour in which quiet patients sat. He describes its shape and furniture with the minuteness of a novelist. His first day's experiences, he narrates with what we consider singular power.

When I came into the room, there was a mild, old, rheumatic man there, who had on a white apron. He was of low stature, and in countenance resembling my father very strongly. My spirits informed me it was my father, who had been raised from the dead, in order, if possible, to assist in saving my soul. He was also in a spiritual body. Everything, in short, had been done to save me by quickening my affections, in order to overcome my torpor, and ingratitude, and fear of man. The chairs in the room, resembling those I had seen when a child in my father's dining-room; the very trees in the distance, resembling others in the prospect round my mother's house; almost all that I saw had been brought by the Almighty power, or infinite goodness of the Lord, and placed around me to quicken my feelings! If a man can imagine realising these ideas, in any degree, awake, he may imagine what were my sufferings.

I asked now what I was to do. There was a newspaper lying on the table, but I could not read it, because, before I had been taken unwell in Dublin, when looking for guidance from the Holy Spirit, I had been diverted from reading the papers, except here and there, as if it were unwholesome to the mind. I thought it ungrateful now to have recourse to them for amusement; and for that reason, or "by that reply," in the language of my invisible companions, I decided my resolution, without quite satisfying them.

What was I to do? I was told it was necessary to do something "to keep my heart to my head, and my head to my heart," to prevent "my going into a wrong state of mind," phrases used to me [by the spirits.] I was told, at length, to "waltz round the table, and see what I should see." I did that—nothing came of it. My attendant requested me to be quiet: at last my dinner was brought. I had, if I recollect accurately, two dinners in this room—one was of a kind of forced meat; the other had bacon with it: both meals were very light, and, although I did not refuse them, I recollect feeling that I could have eaten something more substantial, and also being nauseated at the forced meat and bacon, which, I considered, could not be exactly wholesome for me.

My dinner in this room was served on a tray, with a napkin, silver forks, decanters, &c. &c., and in these respects, such as was fitting for a gentleman.

Unfortunately, the second day, I think, after my entrance into this asylum, having no books, no occupation—nothing to do but to look out of window, or read the newspaper—I was again excited by my spirits to waltz round the room; in doing this, or at a future period, I caught the reflection of my countenance in the mirror. I was shocked and stood still; my countenance looked round and unmeaning: I cried to myself, "Ichabod! my glory has departed from me," then I said to myself, what a hypocrite I look like! So far I was in a right state of mind; but the next thought was, "how shall I set about to destroy my hypocrisy?" then I became again lunatic. Then I resumed my waltzing, and being directed to do so, I took hold of my old attendant to waltz with him; but at last deeming that absurd, and finding him refuse, the spirits said, "then wrestle with him if you will." I asked him to wrestle; he refused. I understood this was to try me if I was sincere; I seized him to force him to wrestle; he became alarmed; an old patient in the asylum passing by the door, hearing a struggle, entered, and assisted in putting me into a strait waistcoat: I was forced down on the sofa. He apologized to me for it many months after, saying it was in the afternoon, when all the other assistants were out walking with their respective patients.

Thus commenced my second ruin.

But we must stop for the present. Mr Percival's history, first and last, is pregnant with instruction; and we mean, if possible, to resume it. It is not his melancholy tale alone, but the dreadful consequences of spiritual delusion, the causes and treatment of insanity, and "the secrets of the prison-house," that stimulate our purpose.

THE QUEEN'S COMFIT-MAKER.

A LEGEND OF TOTENHAM CROSS.

BY MRS GORE.

"A right noble bequest!—a most Christian devise!" exclaimed Master Ebenezer Trackit, the notary of Totenham Cross—folding his hands over his sober doublet, and fixing his eyes contemplatively upon the huge pewter standish, well garnished with goose-quills, which had been placed before him for the purpose of drawing out the heads of testamentary dispositions of Balthazar Sanchez, a wealthy retired citizen, whom his enemies called "the Spanish Jew;" and the haughty esquires, whose lands bordered upon his own, stigmatized with equal contempt as "Sanchez, the comfit-maker."—"All and several those excellent lands and messuages, situate betwixt the northern bank of the Mosel and the farms of Leecroft and Bishopstone," resumed the notary; "the same being estimated at the annual fee and rent of four hundred marks or upwards, lawful moneys of the realm, to be had in perpetual trust by such person or persons as the testator may see fit to appoint, for the erection, entertainment, and maintenance, of a tenement or tenements, for the comfort and refuge of eight individuals of the aged poor of the good parish of Totenham. Such, as I conceive, Master Balthazar, was the purport of your dictation?"

"Even so. For the endowment of alms-houses to contain eight poor people of this parish," replied his employer, from the comfortable easy-chair in which he sat ensconced; and, as he spoke, the old man turned towards the saturnine notary a swarthy but hearty countenance, clearly indicating that the indisposition which had determined him to settle the disposal of his worldly gear was of accidental occurrence. Balthazar's seventy-fifth year found him healthy, wealthy, and wise; easy in mind and body; and, though certain of his neighbours, being envious of the old gentleman's worldly prosperity, presumed to infer that the healthfulness of his body arose, in a great measure, from there being little or no mind to operate upon its condition, it would appear to be better fortune than is usually decreed to the lot of fools for the favourite servitor of an intolerant Papist king to have laid up, like Balthazar Sanchez, stores of riches and honours, during the ascendancy of her most Protestant Majesty, Queen Elizabeth. Among these was his present associate and councillor, Ebenezer Trackit. Nevertheless, although the notary had heretofore inferred and argued respectfully of his client's mental capacities, the charge now entrusted to him to execute somewhat staggered his confidence.

"An estate of four hundred marks per annum!" was Master Trackit's mental commentary on the text. "A third portion or more of his possessions to be flung away in bootless alms upon the ungrateful poor of a foreign nation, without so much as the common return of praise and thanksgiving; since 'tis his will that the benefaction remain a nameless dole, and since, even were the comfit-maker's name blazoned in Roman capitals on the frontal of his alms-houses, my mind misgives me that scarcely a knee within would bend in supplication for the soul of one whom the ragamuffins of Totenham parish designate in their cups no otherwise than as 'the Spanish Jew.'"

"Are the words set down?" quoth Master Balthazar—his patience at length outwared by the length of the notary's cogitations, from which he rightly augured opposition to the purport of his bequest.

"Methought it were safer to allow space for your worship's reflection upon the terms of so munificent an act!" replied the notary, twirling his thumbs.

"Tut, tut!" cried the old Spaniard, impatiently. "Am I then so sorry an ass, friend Trackit, as to entitle you in the supposition that I am disposing, on impulse solely, (the impulse of a hale man suffering from his first twinge of bodily pain,) of a third part of my estate? I tell ye, no, and again, and again, No, Master Notary. For many a year of my past life, such hath been my settled resolve; and I say unto you once more, take, write, that my last will be accomplished."

"Even as you desire, worshipful sir," replied the notary, slowly advancing his hand towards the pewter standish; "yet am I in duty bound to warn and admonish you."

"The deuce you are!" interrupted the Spaniard. "I should have surmised that the warnings and admonishments wherewith I was favoured yesternorn by his pious reverence, Longwind, the rector, might suffice for a season."

"The warnings of his reverence were, in all probability, of a spiritual kind, and regarded your soul's salvation. Mine, Master Balthazar, concern your temporal interests, and are, consequently, more germane to our present purpose," snuffed the lawyer.

"The time is, I take it, come, or coming, with me, when spiritual and temporal must be so blended in my account, that no time ought to be lost in disposing of either," cried the old Spaniard. "Nay, good friend, a truce with superfluous civilities. I ask no compliments either on my look or condition. I know that I am not an ailing man; that I carry my threescore years and fifteen nimbly enough; but I also know that I have lived my appointed time; that the loan of life, apportioned me by my beneficent Creator, hath reached its term; that the great liability is due; and the grim bailiff, Death, justified in forcing an entrance into my dwelling. Let the aged subject of our aged sovereign, therefore, hasten to set his house in order; and for the third and last time, he bids you, Master Notary, take, write, and record, his last will."

"Your farm on the northward bank of the Mosel, betwixt Leecroft and Bishopstone?" demanded Master Trackit, dwelling emphatically on every syllable of the inquiry, and leisurely resuming his pen. And, this time, as if to avoid further parley or preliminary, the venerable testator contented himself with an affirmative nod of the head.

"It is written!" snuffed Ebenezer, after a minute or two, perceiving that his patron, well, or sick, or sorry, was in no humour to be further crossed. "It is written, and shall be fairly engrossed with the rest, for your future signature. Meanwhile, assure yourself, that so prodigal a donation to people nowise akin to you in blood, nature, language, nor nation, will be resented, and probably disputed by process of law, by those whose affinity entitled them, in right, to your inheritance."

"Nowise akin to me in blood?" cried the comfit-maker, turning fiercely upon his confidential adviser. "Is not every son of Adam akin to all the sons of Adam? Is it not written by the great Founder of your faith—(who, were every other instance of divine nature laid aside, had by that alone deserved to be called the Son of God)—is it not written, I say, in the word of Christ, that all men are brethren? and what right have my far-off nephews or nieces to dispute with me touching the claims of our common kindred? Nowise akin to me in blood, nation, or language, quotha? Under what governance, I pray you, have I lived for the last half century? What language hath breathed in mine ears the words of kindness? What sovereign hath been my liege. What laws have been my protection? Why, even those of this fair island of Britain, whose air I have respired in peace, and whose earth will shortly shelter the dust that hath so long burthened her soil! My home hath been among you—my happiness among you; the gold and the silver I have amassed were earned out of the havings of Englishmen. Who, therefore, shall dispute the justice which would award to these, my benefactors, a fraction of the all I owe them?"

"Nevertheless," replied the notary, unmoved by the old man's generous enthusiasm, "the law looks with a jealous eye upon the testamentary caprices of old age. The pretext of heirship is apt to be favoured by the grave personages to whom is entrusted the distribution of property."

"Away with you! To no person or personage, howsoever grave, howsoever influential, is entrusted the distribution of property, over which the lawful possessor hath exercised the right of either gift or bequest!" exclaimed Balthazar. "My estate came not by inheritance—my estate is no lifehold possession, to be derived by my posterity from my ancestry through my transitory enjoyment. This good house over my head—yonder field basking in the sunshine—are mine by no kingly or queenly grant, to some far-off progenitors, in requital of his partisanship, or in guerdon for his servility. I worked for them—I drudged for them—I spared for them; I bought them, little by little, field by field, with the earnings for which I sacrificed my morning rest, my midnight slumber. And are not these mine to dispose of? Think you I would have submitted to labour while others were sleeping, or to fast when others were feasting, save in the certitude that the fruit of my toils was to lie at my own absolute disposal?"

"Perhaps not—probably not; but the grave, Master Balthazar, is a gulf that swalloweth up a man's thoughts and resolves. The coffin-lid closeth over him, and his place knoweth him no longer. The jurisprudence of the country provideth a mind for those who are no longer capable of reflection; and so soon as you are debarred by the great decree of Nature from advocating your own cause, my word upon it, the Queen's learned bench will determine."

"What will it determine? That a man may not do what he likes with his own?" screamed Balthazar, harassed beyond his patience.

"That a man may not do what he likes with his own when he hath outlived the faculties that ought to govern his likings and mislikings," replied the notary, calmly taking the pen from his ear, and replacing it in the standish.

"God's death! Would you assert me to be in my dotage?—would you declare me non compos mentis?" vociferated the old Spaniard, while his brow contracted, and his lips grew livid with rage.

"Would I assert? would I declare? Heaven's mercy and justice forbid!" replied Master Ebenezer, in a tone of deprecation. "But what are my poor assertions to the purpose—more especially while your worshipful self is here in the flesh, to prove your own lucidity of intellect? No, Master Balthazar! It is when the bell hath tolled, and the stone been rolled to the mouth of the sepulchre, that those who come after you will, perforce of bribery or persuasion, induce such evidence of singularity of manners and customs as would assuredly determine any court of justice in the kingdom to set aside the will which you are now troubling yourself to dictate to my humble transcription."

"Set aside, on plea of aberration of intellect, a will expressly setting forth, in the preamble, that I, Balthazar Sanchez, native of the kingdom of Castile, some time comfit-maker to his most Catholic Majesty, Don Philip II., and now resident in the parish of Tottenham Cross, by London, being in a sound state of body and mind, do give and bequeath—I say, Master Notary, being in a sound state of body and mind—in a sound state of body and mind; is it not so set down?"

"It is," replied Ebenezer, somewhat overawed by his vehemence. "Nevertheless, it were no difficult matter to prove, good sir," he continued, taking advantage of the old Spaniard's loss of breath, "that, on the 6th day of June, in the year of grace, 1601, wherein you are pleased thus to record the soundness of your body and mind, the said body had been, for the first time in your mortal life, visited by indications of no less fatal a distemper than paralysis of the lower limbs!"

"'Tis false!" cried Balthazar, starting up; and, in spite of the long brocaded wrapping-gown in which he was enveloped, standing for a moment erect, with no other support than the pressure of his shrivelled hand upon the table—" 'Tis utterly false!"

"Then, old Dosem of the Market Place lies in his teeth," muttered the notary, between his own. "At least," he resumed aloud, "you will admit that you have recently received leechcraft at his hands."

"I sent for the meddling numscull to administer a cataplasm to the shoulder of Zora yonder," cried Sanchez, pointing to a fine Spanish pointer that lay on a rug beside his escritoir—"the poor beast having been hurt by the awkwardness of my nephew-in-law, Sir Carnaby, who stumbled over her with the cup of scalding diet-drink he was officiously hastening to offer me. But I see how 'tis! The whole batch of you are in league against me! The ass, my nephew-in-law, will suborn the paltry compounder of boluses to swear that, at the period of inditing my will, I was infirm of body; and my some time agent and scrivener, Master Ebenezer Trackit, to prove that I was infirm of mind! My household servants will testify that these two sapient witnesses were admitted to my privacy; and the law of the kingdom will forthwith issue a posthumous statute of lunacy against a man whose head is as clear as its own, and whose conscience clearer; and thus my will is to be defeated; the poor mulcted of their rights; and the jackanapes, Sir Carnaby Savile (who married with a comfit-maker's grand-niece in hopes of appropriating his houses and lands as heir-at-law) will be enabled to sport twentynew doublets per month instead of ten; while my lady, his wife, flaunts it at Court, as brave as the best gentlewoman born! I'faith 'tis enough to drive a man mad or into his grave, to think on't!"

"Compose yourself, good Master Sanchez—compose yourself," ejaculated the cunning notary. "All that you apprehend may be obviated, provided you take due care in the wording of your bequest; and, above all, in the selection of the gentlemen of trust to whom you propose to bequeath the execution of your will. Let them be such as Sir Carnaby Savile may not overmatch in cunning or authority. For the latter, if I may presume to suggest, let the Chancellor for the time being, and the Archbishop of Canterbury, whoever may fill that honourable and sacred function, be two of the four trustees of the purposed charity. For the remaining two, I would fain suggest, under submission to your better judgment, the Rector of Tottenham, as being especially interested in bettering the condition of its parish poor; and my humble self, of all men living, best able to prove before her Majesty's courts of justice the sanity of the worshipful testator, and the motives of the bequest."

"Good faith! then slight evidence may suffice!" cried old Sanchez, with a sneer. "For what know ye of my motives? and how, pray, are you to prove to the Consistory Court that I am not a crack-brained humorist, intent upon defrauding my rightful heirs for the sake of a whimsey?"

Master Ebenezer Trackit shrugged his shoulders. His client was hard to please. He would neither submit to be suspected of imbecility, nor to be asserted of sound intellect.

"Nevertheless," resumed the fractious gentleman, ashamed, perhaps, of his own petulance—"I must, perforce, content myself with such instruments as Providence affords me. It may further the accomplishment of my purpose, that a pettifogging lawyer is interested in the scheme. For the sake of public influence, therefore, Master Trackit, inscribe, as trustees of the charity, the names of the two officials highest in authority in Church and State; and, for the sake of professional zeal, the vicar and the attorney. Put your finger in the pie, since I perceive that the pie will else be marred in the baking."

Master Trackit hastened to vindicate himself. His honoured patron wholly misjudged him. He had no wish to be included in the trusteeship—no desire to assist in making or marring the act so ignobly stigmatized by its benevolent deviser.

"Be it as I have said," cried Balthazar, weary of the altercation; "and now, be off with you to your desk. By this hour to-morrow, let the parchment be fairly engrossed; and, when we have read it over together, ere my signature and signet be affixed, in presence of such fitting witnesses as I shall summon for the purpose, you, in your turn, Master Notary, must listen to the recital of the early history of my life."

Ebenezer started in delighted astonishment.

"Seeing that, as you may have to testify of me, and my secret springs of action, it is at least fitting you should know the man of whom you may have to speak; and of whom, whether Jew or Gentile, sinner or saint, at present you know no more than that he was a native of Old Castile, and sometime comfit-maker to his most Catholic Majesty, Don Philip, King of Spain, of blessed memory, as in my will set down."

"And a dutiful and faithful subject of Elizabeth, Queen of England, whom God preserve!" added the notary, with professional precision.

"That as it may be!" muttered Balthazar Sanchez; while Ebenezer gathered up his papers, rose deliberately from his high-backed chair, and looked round in search of his trencher-cap. "Meanwhile, be diligent. To-morrow, sir, at three of the afternoon;—to-day, God speed you."

As the notary emerged from the gateway of Master Balthazar's mansion, (whereon, from privilege of place, as honorary comfit-maker to the Court, the arms of England were emblazoned within a garter, having a lion and griffin for supporters, and the initials "E. R." annexed, in honour of her gracious Majesty the Queen, as may be seen even at this present writing.)* nothing could exceed his exultation at the prospect of penetrating into the mysterious fortunes of an individual, concerning whom so much had been said and surmised in the neighbourhood as Master Balthazar Sanchez. The prospect of becoming trustee of his munificent donation, including right of attorneyship, and chance of litigation of the same, was nothing in comparison with such an insight into his private history as would enable him, from that day forth and for evermore, to taunt and tantalize, on this subject, the inquisitive soul of his gabbling helpmate, Mistress Dorothy Trackit. On this score, however, the notary reckoned without his host; for, on resuming his seat in the dingy parlour of his client the following day, the first word uttered by Balthazar, was a condition of secrecy, so solemn as to appal even the soul of a notary. So manifest, indeed, was the awe of poor Ebenezer, that Master Sanchez instantly invited him to reinforce his courage by a deep draught of Malaga wine, of which two kinds, the sweet and the dry, stood in antique flagons on the board; and, beside them, certain parcel-gilt saucers of rare confectionary, compounded probably, under the personal inspection of the venerable host, by whom, as history informs us, the noble art of comfit-making was first introduced into the realms of Britain.

"Taste, I pray you, of yonder candied pistachio nuts," said the old Spaniard, with a smile more benevolent than he had hitherto vouchsafed to the man of the law. "Their flavour (which hath been commended of more kings, princes, and royal personages, than there are kernals in the dish) may serve to take off the ill-taste of the words I have compelled you to utter. On this especial confection, moreover, Master Ebenezer, is founded the fabric of my fortunes! By this rare invention did your humble servant attract the notice and secure the favour of that memorable prince, on whose dominions the sun did never set, but on whose mind abided impenetrable darkness. God pity him!—he is gone to his dread account; and, sinful soul as I am, rather, in the day of judgment, would I be poor Balthazar, the stewart of pruins, than Don Philip of Old Spain and New, the roaster of his fellow-men!"

The notary cast an anxious glance round the chamber. In those times, sovereigns were not to be thus lightly judged. Though Elizabeth of England was far gone in moral and physical decay, the laws slept not, the scaffold was still active; nor did the hangman, like the old comfit-maker, hold an honorary function at Court.

"Fear not!" quoth Balthazar, replying to his look of mute consternation. "These walls are of notable thickness, as the bills of cost of my masons and bricklayers can attest; seeing that, in my orders for their construction, I purposed them to outlive the existence of many a more lordly roof-tree, in order to testify of the poor comfit-maker to ages yet unborn. Be of good cheer, friend Ebenezer—no eavesdroppers are at hand. With a view to the free discussion of the matters between us, I have dispatched, hither and thither, the varlets, my serving-men; and there are none left besides ourselves within the lintel of my door, saving deaf Margery the cook-maid, who is absorbed in her afternoon diversion, mumbling the penitential psalms in her chimney corner, while she basteth the roast for supper. We are as safe, man, as mice in a malt-tub."

Thus re-assured, Master Ebenezer filled his mouth once more with the pistachio comfits pushed towards him, in their saucer of golden filigree, by his kindly host; and, reclining against a high-backed ebony chair, which, to a modern lounge, would be an instrument of torture, assumed an attentive attitude, while Master Balthazar Sanchez cleared his throat, and delivered himself as follows:—

"Allow me to preface the history of my birth by that of my earliest consciousness. The first thing I remember is tender entreatment in a small farm-house, pleasantly situated some four leagues from Madrid, between a straggling wood and a shallow river, which afforded endless varieties of sport and pastime. The old farmer and his wife who fed and clothed me, spoke of me, among our scanty neighbours, as the orphan of a deceased kinsman; but so indulgent were they in their care, that, even in those years when the heart of childhood hungers and thirsts after parental tenderness, I never seemed to miss the fondness of father or mother; not that I was indiscreetly pampered—the habits of the place were humble and frugal—but I was a healthy happy child, left to the free use of my limbs, to the free enjoyment of earth, air, and water. The river, with its bulrushes for spears, its spotted trout for sport—the wood with its wild fruits, wild flowers, wild squirrels, wilder song-birds—were mine to have if not to hold. I was allowed to wander at will; to see the sun go down and rise again unchanged on the morrow; the moon vanish and re-appear with an altered face; the stars revolve and re-revolve, the same, yet ever varying. There was no one to molest me with restrictions, nor plague me with learning; no doating mother to shriek when I approached the margin of the stream, or fall into a swoon if I climbed the lofty cork-trees in search of a finch's nest: there was not a soul, in short, to interpose betwixt me and our universal Mother, Almighty Nature. Failing the ordinary ties of tenderness, I looked accordingly into her eyes for smiles—I hung upon her lips for love—I clung to her bosom for nourishment and joy. I was alone with her—alone in a desert—alone at that holy age when there is bliss unmingled with awe in utter solitude.

"It did not then occur to me to inquire why I was never called upon to assist the labours of Pepito and Dolores—why all around me were toiling, and I at rest. I perceived only that these indulgent people had authority over me, which, when it suited them, they could exercise; for once, when gazing at a far-off line of mountains bordering the horizon, I expressed a wish to explore their summits, and announced my intention of being off some summer-day on an excursion into the Sierra, the old people denied me so resolutely, that I found my purpose was only to be accomplished by truancy.

“Is not the air good, and are not the woods hereabouts green enow for thy liking, child?” demanded old Pepito, taking the pipe from his mouth. ‘Beware, Balthazar, beware! A league’s space from our humble gates, and there is no safety for thee on earth! Abide with us in peace and safety; or depart, and die the death of a dog.’

“There was something so emphatic in the old man’s words and looks, that, though his threat was mere unsupported assertion, it sunk deep into my heart. I prepared myself for obedience, with all the simplicity of a child; but the following day Dolores, as if compassionating my restlessness, bade me array myself in my best and accompany her to church, whither she had never yet suffered me to bear her company. The farm was a solitary place, remote from village or hamlet; and the chapel, to which the good woman was accustomed to repair for the performance of her devotions, was attached to the convent of Sancta Benedicta, situated about half a league higher up the Manzanares. In the course of my solitary excursion I had often looked with awe upon its moated parapet. There was something in the lofty walls, rising almost to the level of the domed turret tops, and, above all, in the huge black iron cross, surmounting the entrance, which spoke wonders to my imagination. Wandering near it at eventide, I had listened with deep emotion to the tolling of the Angelus; and at times even caught the solemn diapason of the choir, chanting their evening hymn to the Virgin. The nuns (named with deep reverence by the neighbouring peasantry as healers of their ills and comforters of their tribulations) represented to my mind a species of lesser divinities, the invisible origin of mighty and manifold good. Often had I longed to look on the unimaginable faces of those whose lips emitted sounds of such ethereal sweetness, and whose lives were gentle as their voices; and when, following the steps of Dolores, I entered the narrow wicket, crossed the silent court, and slipped into the vast chapel, where only a few country people were kneeling on the marble pavement, (the nuns being concealed from sight behind the sweeping green curtains of the choir,) so overpowering to my senses was the influence of the rolling music of the organ, the fragrant clouds of frankincense, the gorgeous ceiling of the gilded domes, and the deserted solitude of the aisles, that, by an impulsive movement, I dropped on my knees upon the marble floor beside my conductress; raising my hands, and calling in spirit on the name of God, as I had often done amid the green solitudes of the forest, or under the overarching canopy of heaven.

“It was no small disappointment, nevertheless, that a glimpse of my terrestrial angels was denied me; and when, at length, a mumbling, greasy-faced, old gentleman ascended the pulpit, and with a superabundance of groans and gestures, began to preach the religion of persecution—the flames, faggots, and eternal damnation—the spell of my piety was dissolved, and right glad was I when the cessation of his discourse entitled my companion to make her exit from the chapel. To my surprise, instead of recrossing the courtyard towards the wicket, Dolores made towards a side door, and entered a damp vestibule. She had business, it appeared, with the Superior. An aged nun offered to conduct her to the Mother Abbess’ sanctuary, bidding me abide quietly behind; and so little did this first interview with one of my cloistered angels tend to stimulate my curiosity, that it afforded me small pleasure when, after ten minute’s absence, the conductress of Dolores returned, and bade me follow her to the presence of the Superior.

“‘Put off thy cap and shoes, child,’ was the admonition of the old lay sister, as we reached the door; and, thus abjectly prepared, I entered a suite of chambers which, to eyes familiar with the bare walls and rude rafters of Pepito’s farm, appeared secondary only to the temple from which I had recently emerged. A succession of lofty doors of polished wood, incased in white or black marble, heavily but richly carved, gave us access through several chambers hung with tapestry, whereon, to my inexperienced eyes, the figures seemed endowed with life and motion, till we reached a small oratory, the stained windows of which diffused a supernatural hue over a tall cross of ebony, supporting the tortured body of the Redeemer, sculptured in the purest ivory. I forgot to tender my obeisance to the presiding mistress of the place, so thoroughly was my attention absorbed by the saintly sweetness of that dying countenance, and the exquisite beauty of the work.

“‘On thy knees, boy, to the reverend Superior, ejaculated Dolores. But the boy heard her not. His eyes were riveted upon the crucifix.

“‘Your Reverence sees,’ exclaimed Dolores, ‘if such be the first impression, what may not be anticipated from a continuous residence in the community! Snatch, madam, O snatch this brand from the fire! This boy’s sole chance of safety on earth, of salvation hereafter, lies in finding shelter under the roof of the daughters of heaven! Another week, and the restlessness of his humour will bring him within reach of his enemies.’

“Instead of replying, the Abbess kept deliberately surveying me; while I, in return, gazed with wondering admiration upon the lofty figure and commanding countenance, set off by the rich robing of her high vocation.

“‘Be it so,’ said she, at length: ‘I adopt thee, little outcast, into our house. Let him be taken to the confectionary, where sisters Clara and Ofilia will forthwith instruct him in the mysteries which have rendered our convent famous among the banquetries of St Ildefonso.’

" 'Kneel, child—kneel, and crave the blessing of thy benefactress!' cried Dolores, apparently overcome with joy at the prospects unfolding for her protégé; and, though sorely puzzled to conceive what peculiar advantage I was to derive from the protection conceded, or what might be the nature of the mysteries into which I was to be inaugurated—so awe-inspiring was the aspect of the towering Lady Abbess, arrayed in her stole and cross of office—that down I went at her feet, while with her shrivelled hand imposed upon my head, she pronounced her benediction.

"On striking lightly on a bell of golden fret-work, appended to the desk of the oratory, the lay sister again appeared to conduct us forth; and, after threading an infinity of gloomy passages, we suddenly found ourselves in an airy vaulted chamber, the floor of which was of the tessellated marble of the country, with scattered tables of the same costly material, whereat sat divers sisters of the order, enrobed with scrupulous neatness—one shredding rose-leaves into a wicker basket, another carefully separating the petals of a heap of orange blossoms, a third pouring clarified honey through a sieve of snow-white lawn; while several others stood beside little stoves or furnaces, slowly stirring certain delicate confections, the aroma of which imparted a most appetizing flavour to the atmosphere. Such was the confectionary of the convent of Sancta Benedicta; and, young and ignorant as I was, the processes in progress around me, and the death-like silence in which they were performed, were almost as startling as the crucibles and alembics of an alchemist.

"The object of my presence there was soon explained; and, though the glances cast upon me by sisters Ofilia and Clara, to whose hands I had been commended by the Abbess, were far from conciliating, I was too much overpowered by the novelty of the scene to offer much opposition, when my fostermother took leave of me on her departure, promising to furnish me on the morrow with my scanty wardrobe, and exhorting me to be docile and submissive.

" 'But I shall return to the farm—I shall soon return to the farm?' I demanded, clinging to her hand.

"Dolores shook her head.

" 'Nay, but I must and will return,' cried I. 'My garden—my faithful dog—my poor thrush—my'—

" 'They shall be cared for, Balthazar,' replied my fostermother, with a sadder countenance than I had ever seen her wear; 'but I know thee too well, boy, and love thee too well, to renew for thee an enjoyment of a lawless liberty, such as would surely lead to thy destruction.'

"In vain were my remonstrances. The more I entreated, the more Dolores hastened her departure, lest my reluctance should dispose the good nuns harshly towards me; and no sooner was she gone, than the lay sisters gave me over in charge to the old gardener of the convent, whose hovel was to be my sleeping-apartment. Tonsured, bathed, and clad in the linen ephod of a novice,

I was re-admitted on the morrow to the presence of my instructresses, and entrusted with the grating of some ripe citron peels, the delicate fragrance of which almost reconciled me to the task.

"Fear not; I am not about to inaugurate you, good Master Ebenezer, into the arts and mysteries of my calling. Suffice it that, as in all other apprenticeships, that which at first diverted me as a sport, as a task grew tedious. I soon loathed the close confinement imposed upon me—the heated and sickly atmosphere of the confectionary—the penances imposed on me for trifling blunders—the cuffs bestowed when some vessel or implement of silver was presented tarnished to the discriminating eye of sister Ofilia. My young limbs burned to refresh themselves in the limpid brook—my young heart to expand, according to its wont, amid the summer leaves and joyous birds. My sole recreation consisted in an occasional hour's labour with old Pedro in the convent garden; the high walls of which caused even the poor plants and flowers to spindle up towards the blessed light of the sky, even as my own soul was aspiring towards a happier sphere.

"Idle were my repinings! Easy as had been my ingress to the convent, egress was impossible. A rash attempt at escape was punished, not only with the discipline, but with a month's confinement in a solitary cell; and so happy were the results of my seclusion, that, on the cessation of my punishment, I began to find even the air of the confectionary balmy, and 'the gossip of the old nuns, cheering. From that period, all intercourse with poor Dolores (who had been accustomed to visit the convent on Sabbaths and feast days) was denied me; wisely, perhaps; for the less I recurred to the farm, and its rural freedom, the better I was likely to content myself with the narrow limits and formal platbands of Sancta Benedicta, with silent hosts of white-robed sisters gliding like ghosts along the dim alleys.

"Meanwhile, my education progressed. I was instructed, not only in the secrets of the confectionary, but the grand mysteries of the Christian faith. I became a devout Catholic, as well as an expert comfit-maker. On my entrance into the convent, I was scarcely ten years old; and, ere I attained my fifteenth year, even the envy of sisters Clara and Ofilia admitted me to be a master of my art. Already, I had defied them by more than one chef-d'œuvre of inventive genius, especially by certain comfits of candied pistachio nuts, scented with amber, and enrolled in leaf of gold, concocted as an express token of duty to the Lady Abbess, when she dispatched her annual offering of confectionary to the most reverend Archbishop of Toledo. Yet, strange to tell, the older I grew, and the more I excelled, the more I was thwarted and macerated; and though I had now tamed down my spirit so as to submit unresistingly to the heavy penances imposed upon me, I sometimes cursed my life for very bitterness.

"One day when, after having suffered some syrup to lose its colour on the stove, of which sister Clara was in need for the candying of some double violets, whereof it was her custom to forward a gift every spring to an eminent canon of the Church of Oviêdo, a distant kinsman of her own, (or, as the old gardener, Pedro, had hinted to me, her unavowed son,) I was suddenly summoned to the presence of the Superior, whom I had not seen for many months. Satisfied that I was about to undergo a severe reprimand, and, probably, some new mode of penance, I could scarcely conceal my sullenness, as, with downcast eyes, I entered her august presence, and kneeled down to receive the signification of her pleasure."

"Balthazar, my poor lad," said she, addressing me in a tone of more amenity than was her wont, "I have grievous tidings to communicate to thee."

"Instantly recurring to the farm, and those its inmates, who had supplied the place of kinsmanship to my childhood, I hazarded in an inquiring tone the names of Pepito and Dolores."

"They are well, or I, at least, have no news of their mischance," said the Abbess, with dignified contempt. "The intelligence I would unfold, boy, is of far more cruel import than the decease of a Castilian peasant. An unhappy change has occurred in thy destinies, Balthazar; thou art about to quit the convent."

"My heart leapt within me at the word."

"For ever!" persisted the Abbess, in a sepulchral tone—discerning, perhaps, the levity with which I was hearkening to her announcement.

"My countenance again brightened; but I judiciously concealed my joy, by inclining my head towards the earth; and, conceiving that her denunciation had now taken proper effect, the Abbess attempted to neutralize the terrors of her intelligence."

"I own to thee, my son," she resumed, "that even wert thou not summoned hence by impregnable authority, it had been impossible to prolong much longer thy sojourn within these sacred gates, whence those of thy sex are, by the vow of our holy order, rigorously excluded. Thou art no longer a child Balthazar," (God knows, the venerable lady and her coadjutresses had treated me as nothing else!) "and, in regard to thine advancing years, I had purposed to dispose of thee at Whitsuntide in the household of my grandnephew, the Bishop of Leon. But heaven is above all! Thy destinies are removed out of my hands; and I am forced, my poor youth, to leave half accomplished the good deed of thy conversion, and surrender thee to the perils and dangers of the world."

"Dear perils! blessed dangers! how the mere menace caused my young blood to thrill! The only perils I could figure to myself were those by wood or wave, avalanches, mountain torrents, and sea storms, such as I had read of in the lives of the saints."

"In a word, Balthazar," said the old lady, who had favoured me with so many, 'thou art away to court!'

"Involuntarily I raised my joyous face to gaze open-mouthed on the Superior."

"The Prince of Asturias, whom the mother of God and her blessed saints preserve," quoth she, "hath sent for thee to St Ildefonso."

"For me, madam!—the Infant hath sent for me?" was all I could articulate.

"A grace for which thou art indebted to my consideration," resumed the Abbess. "Some days ago, (the very evening when I was horror-struck by the assertion of sister Ofilia, that notwithstanding her express prohibition, thou hadst twice been seen lurking near the garden whereto the sisters of the house are admitted for their hour of recreation,) an express arrived here from my noble kinsman, the Archbishop, requiring the recipe for compounding certain comfits of pistachio nuts, scented with amber, whereof Don Philip had partaken, when, being seized one day, after a prolonged sitting of the council, with a cough, from irritation and exhaustion, the Archbishop dutifully produced his comfit-box till better refreshment was forthcoming. His Highness' palate, Balthazar, was tickled with the flavour of that idle invention of thy leisure!"

"O happy comfits!—O thrice fortunate pistachios!" cried I, in a transport of loyalty.

"But instead of contenting myself with forwarding to my lord the Archbishop," resumed the Abbess, "the instructions of which he stood in need, I acquainted him that the author of the auspicious confection was wholly at his service. His Lordship, it appears, hastened to make the same dutiful tender to the Prince; and, lo! I have before me the sign manual of Don Philip, attaching thee, from this day forth, at a salary of one hundred reals monthly, to the service of St Ildefonso."

"Let no man presume to opine from what quarter will blow the tradewind of his fortunes!" exclaimed the notary, fancying that some comment was required of him. "Promoted at Court per favour of a dish of comfits! The Lord be good to us! Parchment and pounce are little likely to speed a poor English sinner so far as even the porter's lodge of Windsor Castle. Marry, it must have been a right happy day, Master Balthazar, that set you free from the bondage of the old women of Sancta Benedicta?"

"Sweet and sour commingle in every human triumph," replied the confectioner. "At the moment of my departure for Madrid, laden with the gifts and good wishes of my benefactresses, I could almost have wept over my emancipation; and, lo! just as the breath of the free air without the walls, and the long-lost sight of the dancing waters and quivering trees began to restore my consciousness of joy, a withered hand was laid upon my bridle rein, and, drawing me aside out of hearing of the royal courier I was about to accompany to St Ildefonso, poor Dolores whispered a word of warning in my ear."

"I received thy message," muttered she, "that the peremptory commands laid on thee admitted of no leisure for a visit to the farm ; and forthwith hurried hither to arrest thy departure. Balthazar Sanchez ! Go not, O go not to Madrid ! Avoid St Ildefonso ! Tremble at the aspect of Don Philip of Spain. There is not an hour's safety for thee, my son, after quitting the gates of this convent !'

" ' Explain, explain,' cried I, finding that the courier was growing impatient.

" ' I cannot—I dare not ! Life and death are balanced over thy head by a single hair ; yet can I do no more than bid thee beware !' faltered Dolores.

" ' In a few incoherent words I explained the peremptory necessity of obedience to the royal command, referring her to the Lady Abbess for confirmation of my assertion.

" ' Since needs must then,' murmured the affectionate woman with a sigh, ' I can but implore thee, my poor Balthazar, on my bended knees, to keep close to thy vocation ; divide thy days betwixt thy duty and thy devotion ; grow not an idle wassailer like the rest, nor clap hands with chance-companions ;—above all, range not beyond the precincts of the palace. There are those on the watch to do thee evil, who, for dear life's sake, would not adventure within the purlieus of St Ildefonso.'

" The authority of the King's messenger put a close to her extraordinary apostrophe ; and, great as was my amazement at the good woman's mysterious vehemence, my attention was soon diverted by the novelty of the varied scenes that presented themselves, after hurrying from her presence. My early experience was comprised within a walk of the farm—my experience of the last five years within the still narrower compass of a high-walled garden ; and the rapture of my soul, in gazing once more upon the expanded face of Nature, is scarcely to be described in words. The royal messenger—a man accustomed to sit in saddle three hundred days of the year, laughed outright at my ecstasy on viewing the most familiar objects—a willow overhanging a brook, a tree engarlanded with ivy, a bank overgrown with wildflowers.

" ' How will it be with thee, youngster,' cried he, ' when thou beholdest the majestic walls of St Ildefonso ?'

" But the majestic walls of St Ildefonso said nothing to my soul. The scene was but an enlarged portraiture of what I had left behind at Sancta Benedicta ; and there, as at the convent, I was doomed to yearn after green fields and verdant forests, and all the cheerfulness of sylvan freedom.

" Such satisfaction, however, as courtly advancement could bestow, was lavished on me, even to prodigality. Without any announcement of my arrival, the Prince was pleased to detect the cunning of my hand in the very first collation served up to the royal table after my instalment, and to signify his approval, by requiring that my services should be dedicated to his sole delectation. Overawed, in spite of myself, by the mysterious denunciations of my poor foster-mother, I had already determined to confine myself exclusively to the discharge of my duties ; and, my efforts thus highly appreciated, I applied all the force of my ingenuity to the invention of new dainties for the royal palate. Every day, so long as the summer fruits hung ripe on the bough, I strove to enhance their flavour by my confections ; and, on winter days, when they hung there no longer, I recalled them to the memory of Don Philip by some saccharine infusion. Heaven knows, the unhappy Prince had need of syrups and confects to sweeten his imagination, beset as he was with grand inquisitors, churgeons, generals, admirals, and all the unholy army of martyr-makers which surrounds the throne of a bigot Prince. From my poor chamber, adjoining the roof of St Ildefonso, and commanding at least a view of the open country, I truly pitied him—he, whose prospects were so bounded—he, who seemed to build his hopes of heaven on rendering earth a hell to his fellow-men.

" Albeit I strictly adhered to the counsels of Dolores, and, devoted to my daily duties, never attempted to sally forth from the palace-gates ; at odd moments, when my work was done, and the Court engaged in attendance on the royal table or mass, I managed to glide out, and, on pretence of seeking fresh annis or coriander for my comfits, obtain a view, through the gilded lattices of the pleasure-gardens, of the Court ladies, parading in their robes of satin and brocade, to feed the peacocks that clustered round the marble fountains, or the gay Indian carp that glittered in the limpid waters below. One or other of the younger dames was usually loitering, gittern or lute in hand, beneath the dark shadows of the cedars or broad-leaved catalpa trees, shedding a melancholy charm about the place ; and at such times, monotonous as was my daily routine of life, I felt that there was joy in being an inmate of St Ildefonso. It was only when a procession of inquisitors reached the palace with tidings of some grievous arrest or horrible auto-da-fé, destroying the peace of families, and causing my blood to freeze at the recital, that I sometimes repined at being like to live and die the household servant of Philip of Spain.

" Among the happier privileges of my vocation, was that of taking my turn in the daily distribution of the provisions remaining after the meals of the royal household. Every morning, after the ringing of the Angelus, the poor were regaled in one of the minor courts of the palace ; and the constant accession of pretendants to a share in the dole, afforded sufficient proof how highly it was valued by the humble population of the environs. Pilgrims and mendicants thronged to the gate ; infirm and aged persons, who could not dig, and to beg were ashamed ; while others of better degree seemed to find especial pleasure in feeding on the crumbs that fell from a king's table.

" Among the latter, about a twelvemonth after my admission into the royal establishment, I began to notice a female of lofty stature, attired in a mourning habit, who appeared to have seen better days, and to whom I was careful to assign a liberal portion of the spoil. Her face I was unable to discern, so closely was it concealed in the loose cape of her sable dress. Her deportment was that of a person infirm from sickness, rather than advanced in years; and, one morning, when she advanced to receive a basket of bread and fruit which I had set aside for her, I ventured to add an inquiry, whether or not she was in such bodily need as to accept of—I was about to add, such alms as a menial may offer, when, suddenly raising her head so as to look me direct in the face, she deprived me of all power to complete my inquiry. I felt slinking into nothing under the scrutiny of her dark and piercing eyes.

“Is there aught, signora, in which I can do you service or pleasure?” was my amended inquiry; and, unconsciously, I uttered the words with the reverence due to a queen.

“For a moment, the stranger remained silent—her fearful glance still riveted upon my face.

“Meet me this evening, at dusk, at the western extremity of the avenue of catalpas,” said she, in a low concentrated voice.

“The gardens of St Ildefonso are closed at that hour, saving for those connected with the Court,” I faltered in reply—not daring to say, in plain terms, the gates of the royal garden unclose not for mendicants.

“No matter; I shall be there,” replied the stranger; and, folding around her, more closely, the loose cape of serge which replaced the basquiua of a more prosperous class, she turned an angle of the court, and disappeared.

“And now nothing could exceed my perturbation. A year within the precincts of a court had initiated me tolerably well into the tender mysteries of love passages and assignations; but the age and deportment of my new acquaintance repressed all inclination to hope that her business with me was of a tender nature. She might come, however, as the emissary of others; and, though still secretly in awe of one who seemed born for the old Castilian fashion of wearing a dagger in her garter, I was true to my appointment.

“‘Balthazar!’ exclaimed the voice of the stranger, in a scarcely-articulate gasp of delighted surprise, ‘art thou come indeed?’

“‘Thou hadst my word, signora,’ replied I. Then, fearing that, although the gardens were nearly deserted, our interview might attract attention, I took her by the hand, and, leading her, through the dusk, into the deep recesses of a cypress grove, placed her on one of its most secluded seats.

“‘Your pleasure, signora?’ said I, in a low voice. But no answer was vouchsafed save only broken sobs. ‘Your pleasure, signora,’ I again repeated, fearing that I was to be made the dupe of a scene of pretended emotion, when, lo!

instead of replying, the stranger flung her arms passionately round me, and strained me passionately to her bosom. My first impulse was to extricate myself from these unsought embraces.

“‘Balthazar!’ faltered the weeping woman, ‘canst thou not discriminate between the caresses of a wanton and of a mother? Boy, boy, the bosom to which thou art pressed is that which cherished thine infancy! My son—my own—my only! O that thus, by stealth, and in shadows of death, we should be fated to meet again!’

“Great as was my amazement at this outburst of tenderness, the forewarnings of my good Dolores forbade me to give way to the impulses of tenderness waking in my heart.

“‘And how am I to determine the truth of all this,’ said I, labouring to repress my emotion.

“‘Doth not the intensity of an agonized mother’s voice bring conviction with it?’ she replied, relaxing her embrace. ‘Doth nature whisper nothing to thy soul? Submit thee, then, at least, to the testimony of vulgar evidence. I adjure thee, Balthazar Sanchez, by the home and guardians of thine infancy, by yonder farm on the Manzanares’ side, by Pepito and Dolores, thy foster-parents, by the convent of Sancta Benedicta, by’——

“‘All these things may have been reported to thee by others,’ said I, still mistrustful.

“‘By the stain, then, wherewith, in the hour of birth, thy right arm above the wrist was disfigured, I challenge thee, as my offspring, and claim of thee the honour and homage of a son!’ said the stranger, in stern displeasure; and, this time, my answer consisted in dropping on my knees at her feet! But though thus tacitly recognising her claim, no yearning of the affections impelled me to lavish upon her the caresses of a child. I was awe-struck—overpowered—but not softened by the discovery that I was no longer an orphan. Nature seemed to forewarn me that there were humiliating secrets in store for me; that I was already encompassed by the snares announced by Dolores.

“I was not long left in suspense. My mother, (or let me at once assign to her the name by which she at length announced herself,) the Signora Rachaela Sanchez, aware that the moments of our interview were numbered, suffered me not to waste my time in interrogation.

“‘Thou wouldst doubtless know, Balthazar,’ said she, enfolding her arms around me as I sat beside her on the marble bench, ‘to what end I have thus strangely prolonged my separation from the child of my flesh? The moon hath not yet revolved, my son, upon my sojourn in Spain! I come to thee, after an exile in foreign lands; after fifteen years of toil and privation, under the scorching suns of Africa; and if the coldness with which thou hast welcomed me arise from the fears inspired by my mendicant’s habit, arise and be of good cheer. I am rich, Balthazar. Though driven into banishment, a worse than beggar, the God of my fathers hath prospered me; and I return to my native country, (albeit in secret, and under peril of the laws,) opulent enough to bribe, if not the clemency of the King, at least the mercy of the executioner !

“ ‘ The executioner ? ’ faltered I ; the secret misgivings suggested by the Israelitish name of Rachaëla, gradually increasing.

“ ‘ Hath the woman Dolores so far fallen from her pledge, as to keep thee ignorant of the misfortunes of thy parents, that thou art thus astounded ? ’ cried my mysterious mother in a low hoarse voice. ‘ Not content with defiling thy young life by contact with a Christian congregation ’—

“ ‘ A cry of horror, bursting from the very depth of my soul, interrupted her disclosures. ‘ Speak, speak ! ’ I exclaimed, trembling with apprehension. ‘ Who am I—and what art thou, that thus overcomest my mind with terrors ? ’

“ ‘ Thou art the circumcised child of persecuted parents, pertaining to the people elect of God,’ replied Rachaëla, with haughty defiance. And no sooner had the fearful secret escaped her lips, than in lieu of renewing my intreaties for farther information, I placed my hands upon her lips, imploring her to forbear.

“ ‘ Ay ! ’ cried she, with bitterness, having at length wrested away my hand—‘ like the rest, poor miserable poltroon, thou shrinkest from her on whose head a price is set by the minions of the law ! Thou wouldst even deny, I doubt not, thy persecuted creed ! ’

“ ‘ My creed ? It is none of mine ! ’ I exclaimed, with indignation. ‘ The very name of Jew is loathsome in my ears ; to the God of Christians was I taught to bend my knees ; among Christians have I abided—among Christians will I still abide. Unless thou art some messenger of Satan, sent to work the perdition of my soul, away with thee at once lest I be tempted.’—

“ ‘ To what ? ’ interrupted Rachaëla ; ‘ to surrender me into the hands of the blood-sucking Inquisition, or of the stony-hearted Prince, their master and thine Do it. Summon the guard ! Resign to their tender mercies the mother who bore thee, that they may butcher her, even as they did thy father, the husband of her youth, as a sport for the populace of Madrid ! ’ “ ‘ Unconsciously I approached, and took her hand.

“ ‘ Was it not a pleasant recreation for them ! ’ continued Rachaëla, in an appalling whisper. ‘ An auto-da-fé ! The Inquisition, with its banners, and torches, and fiend-like familiars ! The well-piled faggots, the resin, the tar-barrel ! to torture, both in the flesh and the spirit, the last moments of poor Caspar Sanchez, the mildest, truest, kindest, of all the sons of his tribe ! Caspar, who never wronged a fellow-creature of a doit, nor injured a hair of mortal head ! But he was a Jew—a proscribed Jew ! Driven by royal edict from the fertile fields of Spain, he had presumed to return (even as I have now returned) by stealth and in disguise, in order that his first-born child might see the light beneath the same roof where he had first beheld it. And, lo ! the Christian murderers, whose creed professes pardon, and meekness, and peace, detected us in the worship of the God of Israel, and plunged him into the dungeons of the Herman-dad ! Then it was that, escaping in the darkness of the night, my infant in my arms, I preserved thy life, Balthazar, by entrusting thee to the honest couple whom the humanity of thy poor father had in his better days preserved from ruin. Even fallen as we were, Pepito and Dolores swore to become parents to the orphan child of Caspar Sanchez.’

“ ‘ And nobly fulfilled their undertaking,’ said I, firmly.

“ ‘ ‘Tis false ! ’ cried my mother. ‘ In accepting, for thy behoof, the small sum I had been able to bear away, they solemnly undertook to use no efforts to detach thee from thy father’s faith.’

“ ‘ Nor did they. No word of religious instruction did I ever receive from their lips. It was only when, with coming years, they saw the turbulent spirit of the circumcised boy abandoned to their charge, expose him to danger of detection, that they placed me in the convent of Sancta Benedicta, and thus wrought the good work of my salvation.’

“ ‘ And of my revenge ! ’ added my mother, in a low concentrated voice. ‘ Little dreamed those poor, bigoted, Castilian boors to how great a deed they were devoting their nursing Balthazar ! I have told thee that, to save thy life, I fled before the enemies of thy father. To avenge his death have I borne thenceforward the burden of existence. To thy hand, boy, the deed of retribution is decreed. In the Word of the God of Israel is it written—‘ an eye for an eye, a tooth for a tooth, a life for a life ! ’ and, lo ! a royal one is assigned to repay the death of my murdered Caspar !—Philip of Spain, the blood-thirstiest of her blood-thirsty princes, the favouring and favoured son of the Holy Herman-dad, must die by thy hand ! ’ ”

The gradually increasing emotion with which the venerable Spaniard had been pursuing his narrative, now thoroughly overcame him. Reclining breathless in his chair, he wrung his hands in utter agony, till the notary, after much soothing expostulation, entreated him to pass briefly over such passages of his history as were too afflicting to his soul.

“ ‘ Be it so,’ murmured the old gentleman, when at length he regained the power of utterance. ‘ Let it suffice thee, in a few fearful words, that, at that first interview and many succeeding ones, the implacable widow of Caspar Sanchez left no argument unattempted to prove that I owed it as a sacred duty to the memory of my father to offer up in atonement the life of Don Philip ! The facilities afforded by my confidential post rendered the horrible deed only too easy of accomplishment. Furnished by my mother with the slow but subtle poisons of the East, I had only to decree the death of the Prince of Asturias, escape with Rachaëla to the coast ere the effects of the poison were manifest, and, hastily embarking, betake myself to the land of my forefathers; and glowing, indeed, were the terms in which Rachaëla described, to my bewildered senses, the joys of an Oriental clime.

"Fearful!—oh, fearful was my temptation!—not that for a moment I inclined towards the commission of so great a crime; but, on discovering my abhorrence, my mother astuciously addressed her endeavours to obtain an influence over my affections—pretending to listen to the arguments with which I endeavoured to convert her to the religion of peace—while, ever and anon, artfully reverting to the virtues, the suffering, the frightful end of my father—then, when satisfied of having roused in my bosom the dormant filial instincts, so potent in all human hearts, she failed not to threaten, in case of my persisting in my resistance, to give herself up to the Holy Tribunal, and suffer death as a Jewess, before the face of God and of her son!

"Perplexed!—bewildered!—at one moment on the point of myself accusing her as a regicide—the next, almost disposed to become an assassin, rather than endanger the life of the author of my days, how I longed for a renewal of those peaceful times of old on the banks of the Manzanares—how I regretted the uneventful moments of the convent of Sancta Benedicta!

"The perils in which I stood—the intemperate revilings of Rachaëla—the revulsion of feeling produced by loving as a mother one whom I abhorred as a Jewess—at length so irritated my blood as to throw me into a raging fever. In the ravings of delirium my secret transpired; and, though at first treated as the delusion of insanity, the perpetually recurring terms of my adjurations at length determined the royal confessor (who had been brought by my fellow-servants to witness my excitement) to institute an investigation.

"Spare me the rest. When, at the close of many months, I was restored to perfect consciousness, I found that the fires of the Inquisition had again been kindled, and that another victim was gone to rejoin the manes of Gaspar Sanchez!

"My first impulse was to depart from a country watered with the blood of my kindred. But the contempt with which, on my recovery, I found myself treated by my comrades, who affected to regard me as a recanted Jew, determined me to tarry for a while, lest it should be supposed I fled from fear of their misusage. But, while thus irresolute, I was summoned into the presence of the comptroller of the royal household; who (after bidding me bless, upon my knees, the clemency of Don Philip,) acquainted me that the Prince, being about to embark for England to solemnize his union with Queen Mary, had decided that I should form one of the royal suite.

"Don Philip condescends to consider," he continued, "that no stronger evidence of fidelity could be afforded than by your steady resistance to the evil suggestion of a mother. No reward, therefore, the stanchness of your faith as a Catholic, and loyalty as a subject, he doubles your salary as chief confectioner, and bids you prepare for immediate embarkation."

"Rebellion against such a mandate had been impossible; but I was, in fact, overjoyed to be released from Spain. A residence at St Ildefonso, darkened by such dreadful reminiscences, was unsupportable. Madrid was worse; the church of the Dominicans, where sentence had been pronounced upon my parents, and the Plaza where their horrible destiny was accomplished, were alike hateful to my soul. The invisible hand of the Holy Hermandad, seemed armed against my life—mysterious voices ever murmured in the air, prophesying evil; and whenever it was my chance to meet a procession of the order of St Dominic, the blood seemed frozen in my veins.

"Under such circumstances, Master Notary, judge how great was my relief to disembark upon the strand of Britain. The land, as we sailed betwixt the wooded banks of the Southampton river, looked green and tranquil as a dove's nest; and, though the minds of the people were disposed against this Spanish alliance, desiring to behold their Queen wedded with a countryman of their own, yet was our reception and progress bright with overflowing hospitality.

"It needs not to enlarge upon the events that followed. The favour I enjoyed in the eyes of the Prince, sufficed to recommend me to the grace of her Majesty—who, in her fulsome fondness for a bridegroom eleven years her junior, used to requite, with the most lavish prodigality, the trifling gifts offered as tokens of his respect. Among these, according to the custom of Spain, sweetmeats were a common offering; and, on occasion of his Highness' presenting to her Majesty on her birth-day, a comfit-box, richly encrusted with jewels, and filled with his favourite confection of candied pistachio nuts, Don Philip took occasion to relate the story of his faithful Balthazar, whose abilities he was pleased to estimate far beyond their desserts.

"The youth must henceforward be especially attached to my household," replied the Queen, at the close of her royal husband's narrative; and no small relief was it to my mind that, when Don Philip, weary of the thralldom of wedlock, affected to be recalled to Spain by business of State, that I was allowed to remain behind, in the quiet verdant seclusion of Richmond. There, oh, there, did Nature seem to take me once more to her bosom! In this sylvan retreat, the peace of other days came back to me. Amid the blending beauties of its woods and waters, I tried to lose the impression of my past afflictions.

"The sole embitterment of my life arose from the religious persecutions which soon filled the kingdom with tears and anguish. Though the temper and constitution of the country forbade the introduction of the Inquisition, as at one period meditated by the Queen, the intolerant spirit of Philip's congenial wife, caused the flames of persecution to be kindled; and, in lieu of Pagans and Jews, Christian now consigned his fellow Christian to the stake.

"Against such a breach of divine law, my soul revolted; and, in many a secret prayer did I commend myself to the Almighty, imploring him to soften the heart of the Queen, and so modify the belief of the people that the religion of Christ might become all in all, and faith, hope, and charity govern the institutions of the land.

"'Beware!' would oftentimes exclaim that prudent and tender soul, Mistress Alice Harkwell, who afterwards became my wife and household comforter; 'beware lest these unorthodox sentiments be suspected. Thine opinions, Master Balthazar, savour of the fagot and tar-barrel. By my sooth! thou art already half a Protestant.'

"And so, true to her insinuation, on the death of the Queen, and the accession of the glorious Elizabeth, I became wholly a Protestant, and her spouse. It was not, as many inferred, the desire to retain my place at Court which opened my ears to the arguments wherewith the chaplains of her Majesty laboured to enlighten the darkness of her faithful servitors; but that, from the Popish cause there emanated an odour of human blood, too grievously reminding me of the fate of my parents! Persecution and intolerance were the handmaidens of the Roman Catholic Church; and, somehow or other, the Jewish blood within me seemed to curdle in my veins at the very sight of the uplifted Host.

"At the Queen's coronation, Master Notary, trust me, there was not a more devoted Protestant kneeling in the aisles than he by whose skill was compounded the masterpiece of confectionary, that glittered at the banquet as chief decoration of the royal table. Your countrymen came forthwith flocking to the palace, desiring to be instructed in my arts! Scholars had I, almost beyond my power of reckoning; and it hath been pretty generally affirmed that to poor Balthazar Sanchez England is indebted for the introduction of the art of comfit-making. Though now and then a jealous rival presumed to whisper of me as 'the Spanish Jew,' none dared to gain-say the award when, in my old age, the Queen's gracious Majesty permitted me to retire from Court for the enjoyment of my means, retaining to the end of my days the title of honour of her royal confectioner."

"Nor needs there a better proof, Master Sanchez, of the good renown wherewith you have borne it," interrupted old Trackit, "than that the grandniece of your late spouse (who, failing issue of your body, you adopted as heir) should have been sought in marriage by no less worthy a gentleman than Sir Carnaby Savile."

"A fig for Sir Carnaby Savile!" cried Sanchez, filling his glass from the flagon of dry Malaga standing on the table beside him. "Sir Carnaby would have mated with my mother, Rachaela, or any maiden or matron of her tribe, upon sufficient incitement of gold. No more! Enough of my heir-at-law and of his virtues. They are not of such weight with me as to obstruct my long-meditated purpose of giving to the poor a third portion of my substance, and so pleading to the Lord's mercy for the errors of my fathers, and my own levity, if levity there be, in changing the form of my devotions. Albeit the worldly blessings, wherewith the Almighty hath blessed me, may be esteemed tokens of divine forgiveness, there are times when my soul hath been exceeding sorrowful with perplexity betwixt the Jewish creed to which I was born, the Catholic faith in which I was nurtured, and the Protestant Church to which I now adhere. If I have sinned, however, in this thing, it hath been with good intent; and soon may the blessings of the poor confirm the promises of grace to the dying moments of THE QUEEN'S COMFIT-MAKER."*

* Balthazar Zanca or Sanchez, who came to this country in the train of Philip II., was the first royal confectioner attached to the English Court. After being converted to Protestantism, he died, in 1602, at his mansion at Totenham Cross, having contributed to the cost of the brick cross erected by Dean Wood in 1600, in place of the wooden one then standing; and erected, at his sole expense, an almshouse for eight poor persons. The residence of Balthazar Sanchez, now an inn, and the almshouse in question, remain in good preservation.

MARY STUART'S FAREWELL TO FRANCE.

(From the French of Beranger.)

Farewell! thou charming land of France!

Lov'd shalt thou be for evermore;

Here beam'd my youth's first happy glance—

Adieu!—'tis death to quit thy shore!

Adopted home of childhood's years,

From whence I now must banished be,

My farewell take—receive my tears,

And keep, O France! my memory.

The wind is high—we quit the land—

Yet all unmov'd by tearful eyes;

To cast me back upon thy strand

Heaven biddeth not the waves arise.

When, 'mid my favourite people's gaze,

I cross'd the Tournay's brilliant ring,

Less warm the shouts my rank could raise

Than those which hail'd my beauty's spring.

Vain is the crown—the sceptre vain—

To me in gloomy Scotland shewn;

Unless it were o'er France to reign,

I never wish to fill a throne.

There Glory, Love, and Genius smiled—

And deep my youth has drank of all;

But now, in Caledonia wild,

What change must o'er my fortunes fall!

Dark too an omen lately gleamed,

(Well may my heart affrighted be,)

For in a vision dread there seem'd

A scaffold raised—and raised for me.

O France! 'mid future wrongs and fears,

The daughter of the Stuart's line,

As in this day that sees her tears,

Shall turn to thoughts that once were thine.

But see! the ship's too rapid sail

Already speeds 'neath darkening skies;

And night, beneath her humid veil,

Conceals thee from mine eyes.

Farewell then, charming Land of France!

Lov'd shalt thou be for evermore;

Here beam'd my youth's first happy glance—

Adieu!—'tis death to quit thy shore. L. F.

THE LOCKHART AND BALLANTYNE CONTROVERSY.

- I. Refutation of the Mistatements and calumnies contained in Mr Lockhart's "Life of Sir Walter Scott," respecting the Messrs Ballantyne. By the Trustees and Son of the late Mr James Ballantyne.
- II. The Ballantynes Humbug Handled. By Mr Lockhart.
- III. Reply to Mr Lockhart's Pamphlet. By the Authors of the "Refutation," &c.

GRUB STREET LOWER ought to set up a statue in bronze to Mr Lockhart, in commemoration of his notable achievements, in throwing open the dark recesses of GRUB STREET UPPER. By the singular disclosures which he has either made himself, or wrung by stings and the rack from the Ballantyne Trustees, he has revenged the beggarly denizens of the ancient locality, throughout all their starving generations, upon the aristocracy of literature. He has successfully proved how much more shabby, tricky, and morally despicable, when the inner movements are revealed, may be the great game where the stakes played for are titles and estates—or tens and hundreds of thousands—than the pitiable struggles of the very poorest man of genius who, in all circumstances, retains the whiteness of his soul, and whose worst difficulties may have only been, to obtain bread for his children;—like Goldsmith, for many a day, the rent of his garret; or, like Johnson, the price of his mother's coffin.

After all that we have read or heard of the Calamities of authors, we are compelled to own, that the bitterest portion of an author's miseries has been Sir Walter Scott's. It is the strange duplex movement of Scott's Mind and Life, as revealed in these humiliating and afflicting pamphlets, which to us constitute their great interest. As to Mr Lockhart's good taste and feeling in composing a considerable part of Sir Walter Scott's Life, our judgment was made up, and rather frankly expressed, long before any one of them appeared. To the Ballantynes—to Mr James Ballantyne in particular—we felt that he had done gross and, everything considered, pitiful injustice: but, in our opinion, the case stood still worse as to Dr John Leyden, Thomas Pringle, the Ettrick Shepherd, Alister Campbell, and other men of genius, who have no sons nor friendly Trustees to do justice to their true characters, and defend their memories from clumsy ridicule, and wanton and unprovoked misrepresentation.

The three curious productions named at the head of this article, furnish the text of a much more grave and far-reaching discourse than any that could be warranted by the controversy which Mr Lockhart has imprudently provoked. But this properly belongs to the Memoirs of Scott, when they shall be impartially written. As regards the merely personal question, James Ballantyne's Trustees and his son, have, we think, triumphantly made out their case against their supercilious opponent. That this could not be done without deep and permanent injury being inflicted on the memory of Scott, is wholly attributable to the arrogance of manner, and the unfairness of statement, which Mr Lockhart has throughout displayed. It is quite true, that he has partially succeeded in shewing up a few harmless foibles in James Ballantyne; but at what a price has this been accomplished! Henceforth let no one call Mr Lockhart a proud man. Rash, if not reckless, insulting, uncandid, unfair, and, we fear, spiteful, he may be called: but he is anything rather than a proud man. The inordinate respect which a high-minded man cherishes for himself will ever prove a more powerful restraint on his license of statement and language than any that an adversary can impose. Now, in his management of this controversy, the editor of The Quarterly has been as condescending in the free use of abusive and insolent language, and in calling names and giving nicknames, as the veriest Grub Street author could desire; and, all the while, this vulgarity is directed against persons whom he assumes to treat as immeasurably his inferiors. The Trustees, whether tradesmen or professional men, though sufficiently acute and cutting at times, have a manifest advantage over Mr Lockhart, in never abandoning that decent propriety of language which they owed to themselves, if not to their supercilious and unceremonious adversary; while they have carefully and ably elaborated every point in Mr Lockhart's statements, and knocked them down one by one.

When the Trustees and the son of Mr James Ballantyne published their "Refutation of the Mistatements and calumnies contained in the Life of Sir Walter Scott," we reserved our judgment, merely noticing that Mr Lockhart could not sit down under the very serious charges brought against him by the highly respectable parties who had come forward in defence of the character of Ballantyne. Long was the demolition, the utter destruction of Ballantyne's defenders threatened; and the "Humbug Handled" came forth at last. Its tendency was to prove that scurrility of language, insolence of tone, and the pitifulness in the general style of invective, could produce little effect, or none that was favourable to Mr Lockhart, upon persons of any reflection; but then the array of figures, the bold allegations of the systematic deception and fraud practised by the Ballantynes, upon good, easy, generous, credulous, simple-minded Sir Walter—his head ever wrapt in the clouds of the regions of romance, his mind wandering, like "True Thomas," in Fairy Land, while "Johnny Rigdum" bamboozled him with hocus-pocus accounts, and James played a yet darker game—who could help being staggered for a time by these statements, especially when, after a dexterous confusion of figures, Sir Adam Ferguson (who enjoys the honour of having the "Humbug" addressed to him) was told that James Ballantyne's complaint, after the bankruptcy, "that his family had been reduced from affluence to beggary by no particular error of his own," was the grossest humbug of all! "Reduced from affluence!" quoth Mr Lockhart. "They" (the Ballantyne family) "had only been removed from a well of other people's money, into which Mr James had nimbly dipt his bucket during twenty years, whenever it suited his purpose to do so. And, undoubtedly, all his kith and kin had partaken largely in this species of affluence." And Mr Lockhart goes on to shew, how kind James Ballantyne most liberally and lavishly provided for his parents and relatives, his wife's included, (all the while with Scott's money,) and ends with the old motto, "Hoc demum liberalitas appellatur, aliena bona largiri;" which we may freely translate—"It is easy cutting whangs aff other folk's cheese."

After such grave statements, from the editor of The Quarterly, although proof against the mere scurrility, and perceiving the palpable fallacy of many of Mr Lockhart's tables of figures and reasonings, and though committed to the controversy by our previously expressed opinion of the injustice done Ballantyne among others in the Life, we were again compelled to suspend our final judgment, and wait to hear what the Testamentary Trustees and Mr James Ballantyne's son might have farther to say in explanation. We knew not what to make of the extraordinary revolution which had taken place in Mr Lockhart's opinions, since, in the Life, vol. vi., page 110, he had made a rather frank sort of amende honorable to Ballantyne's relatives for the impertinences and unfounded assertions of the earlier volumes. The apologetic explanation, tardily given, was to us quite irreconcilable with the "nimble bucket-dipping into the well of other people's money;" and the dishonest, or, at all events, the disreputable extravagance of Ballantyne's alleged habits. We turned up the passage in the volume, and there read—"I have been entirely mistaken, if those to whom I allude, (Ballantyne's relatives,) or any other of my readers, have interpreted any expressions of mine, as designed to cast the slightest imputation upon the moral rectitude of the elder Ballantyne. I believe James (the bucket-dipper) to have been, from first to last, a perfectly upright man; that his principles were of a lofty stamp—his feelings pure even to simplicity." With this in full recollection, and after the small impertinences, meant for wit and jocularly, on the subject of James Ballantyne, had been thus in some sort atoned for, how were we to consider him under the entirely new aspect in which it pleased Mr Lockhart to present him to the world in the "Humbug Handled?" The acrimony and arrogance, the mere abusiveness, and the aims at wit of that pamphlet, might have passed for Mr Lockhart's way; but what was to be thought of the total transformation of "the perfectly upright man of lofty principles," and "feelings pure even to simplicity," into an ungrateful knave, who, through life, had cheated and preyed upon his generous and unsuspecting benefactor? We waited for the reply; and that being now before us, we shall proceed to notice the salient points of the painful, and, we trust, now-concluded controversy, which has been thrust upon Ballantyne's Trustees by the intemperance and imprudence of Mr Lockhart.

From Mr Lockhart's Memoir, the world has learned that Scott, when a sickly boy living under the care of his maiden aunt at Kelso, became the playmate and schoolfellow of James Ballantyne, the son of a shopkeeper, or, as the Scotch courteously phrase it, of a merchant, there, and descended, like the son of the Goodman of Sandy Knowes, from the respectable yeomanry of the country. In those happy days, there could be little or no visible distinction of rank between the son of the Kelso general-dealer, or store-keeper, in respectable trade, and located in the capital of the then richest agricultural district in Scotland, and the son of the Edinburgh W.S., and grandson of the said Goodman of the Sandy Knowes. In point of expense, or style in living, the "merchant"—who, like those of his calling, making his money easily, spent it as freely,—must, in those simple days, have outshone his rural neighbours. Besides giving his sons the best education which the country afforded, the elder Ballantyne, as we are informed, drank wine, and even kept a horse; and actually, which is more to the point, bought a rocking-horse for his son James, even as the extravagant and reckless James did, in turn, for his son John, as Mr Lockhart has informed the world, with many notes of admiration at this piece of prodigality and presumption in the ambitious printer. It is, moreover, current—among the endless gossiping stories which Mr Lockhart's attacks on the Ballantynes, and especially his condescending to such small and minute items of biography as the rocking-horse—that the veritable rocking-horse, erewhile bestrode by James in the paltry village of Kelso, was, in progress of time, transferred from the Canongate to 39, Castle Street, and mounted by the present Sir Walter, the Major of Hussars. The anecdote is quite true, we believe, and so every-way worthy of the dignified statement which has elicited it, that it would be a pity to suppress it. In the meanwhile, Walter Scott and James Ballantyne, untroubled about their respective ranks, grew up and carried the friendship of their boyhood into life. Ballantyne began business in Kelso as a solicitor; and, at the request of the gentlemen of the neighbourhood, became editor and printer of The Kelso Mail; and, having exhibited some beautiful specimens of typography, was, probably from friendly feelings, but also with certain ulterior views, invited by Scott, then "a briefless barrister," though dawa-ing into notice as an author, to try his fortunes as a printer in the metropolis. According to Lockhart, Scott perhaps "even thus early contemplated the possibility, at least, of being himself connected with the result of those air-drawn schemes;" for thus is Mr Lockhart pleased to describe laying the foundation of a flourishing and lucrative printing business, the success of which Scott fully foresaw, and which his wild speculations, as a publisher, and buyer of land, could not wholly ruin. Ballantyne, as he was far from needing to change, was not rash in abandoning the newspaper, which he had been successful in establishing in Kelso, and the printing business, which he must have made profitable even in the provincial locality. In the pamphlet, we find,

From the following passage in a letter from Ballantyne to Scott, in March 1802,* it appears that the printer was hesitating as to some renewed suggestions from his friend regarding his removal to Edinburgh; and that he was in the meantime exerting himself to follow up the advantage he had gained. "Your query respecting Edinburgh I am yet at a loss to answer. To say truth, the expenses I have incurred in my resolution to acquire a character for elegant printing, whatever might be the result, cramp considerably my present exertions. A short time, I trust, will make me easier, and I shall then contemplate the road before me with a steady eye."

But, in the end of 1803, he did unfortunately follow Scott's suggestion; and, on his removal to Edinburgh, received a loan from his future partner of L.500, and was patronised as far as was then in Scott's power. Scott, having felt his way for some years, and tested both the qualities of the printer and the profitable nature of the trade, proposed the secret partnership.

Mr Lockhart himself admits his "suspicion" that Scott had long harboured this design—so early, indeed, as the date of Ballantyne's projected removal from Kelso to Edinburgh; and Mr Lockhart adds, as a further motive, that there was "little doubt that the hope of succeeding at the bar had waxed very faint, before the third volume of 'The Minstrelsy' was brought out in 1803." At the same time, Scott, to use his own words, was determined that literature should be his staff, but not his crutch, and that the profits of his literary labour should not, if he could help it, become necessary to his ordinary expenses. Thus, despairing of success in his profession, and determined not to depend upon literature, the remaining resource was trade; and hence it was that he became first a printer, and afterwards also a publisher. The following passage of Mr Lockhart's work,† written, it would appear, before he had thought it necessary to sacrifice James Ballantyne's character, gives a just account of Scott's views and motives upon this occasion:—

"The forming of this commercial connexion was one of the most important steps in Scott's life. He continued bound by it during twenty years, and its influence on his literary exertions and his worldly fortunes was productive of much good and not a little evil. Its effects were, in truth, so mixed and balanced during the vicissitudes of a long and vigorous career, that I at this moment doubt whether it ought, on the whole, to be considered with more of satisfaction or regret."

The world has no doubt whatever on this head, and still less, we should imagine, the friends of the Ballantynes. Had Sir Walter Scott, like the proprietors of Blackwood's Magazine, of The Edinburgh Review, and the many other good customers among the regular publishers, who were drawn to Ballantyne's office solely by its reputation for beautiful and accurate printing, been content to give his old schoolfellow, and most zealous and friendly corrector and critic, his business and influence, very different results might have been anticipated from those which left James Ballantyne, in 1816, penniless and deeply in debt, and, in 1826, after twenty years of exertion and industry, rendered unusually effective by the talents and knowledge to which Mr Lockhart himself bears frequent testimony, a bankrupt, and with the world to begin again. When the first copartnership was formed, in 1805, Ballantyne had already acquired a respectable capital for a young printer. It was in stock, or materials, L.2,090,—besides book debts to the amount of L.1,668:9:11, which were carried to the account of the company. The relative sums of the partners at starting stood thus:—Ballantyne, L.3,758:9:11; Scott's in-put as his share of stock, L.2,008. Scott was to have one-third of the profits; and Ballantyne, whose time was entirely devoted to the business, was to draw two-thirds. When a subsequent copartnership was formed, Scott, having the power, laid down the law, and obtained a full half of the profits of a much larger trade; his influence in obtaining business being, he alleged, a full equivalent for Ballantyne's skill, time, and capital in the business. The original company then started, with Ballantyne having, though not all free, in outstanding debts and stock, L.1,750:9:11 more than Scott; and because in the first years, while the old accounts came in and the old printing-office debts became due, he drew out money to pay them—his own money, be it remarked—Mr Lockhart chooses to represent him as overdrawing to an immense extent, and has very dexterously mystified the whole matter; if indeed his extraordinary allegations are not made in sheer ignorance of the plainest principles of accounts; which, were Mr Lockhart ingenuous about other things that he cannot fail to understand, charity would compel us to believe. On going over the books of the company for the first two and a-half years of its subsistence, Mr Lockhart sums up thus, and with his favourite figure of four notes of admiration:—

On the whole, between Whitsunday 1805 and Martinmas 1807, it appears that Scott's drafts on the business came to L.306:4:3, James Ballantyne's to L.3,966:4:11!!!

When we read this, among other startling statements, in Mr Lockhart's "Humbug-Handled" pamphlet, we, without farther examination, shut the book, like, we doubt not, many others, fairly giving up James Ballantyne as a reckless and extravagant, if not dishonest, man. Since the "Reply" to Lockhart by the Ballantyne Trustees has appeared, we have however carefully gone over the ground, with the advantage of those lights which it suited the author of the "Humbug" to shroud or extinguish; and the following abstract is the result, bringing the balances of the partners a year further down than the period marked by the quadruple notes of admiration:—

* "Life," vol. i., p. 348.

† Vol. ii., p. 41.

At the commencement of the copartnery, there was a difference in favour of Ballantyne, in stock and debts, of L.1750 : 9 : 11. During the first half-year of the copartnery, Ballantyne drew from his surplus stock, &c., L.1193; but at the half-yearly balance, in November, he has still of capital - L.2,932 4 4
 Scott's capital at this balance was 2,141 7 5

Difference in favour of Ballantyne, L.790 16 11

At the next balance, in May, 1806, after all his drafts during the year now expired, the capital of Ballantyne amounted to - L.2,952 17 2
 Scott's augmented capital, L.1000 more being put in, was - 3,301 5 1

Difference in favour of Scott, L.348 7 11

At the balance of Martinmas, 1806, the capital of Scott amounted to - L.3,469 6 1
 Ballantyne's capital, - 3,110 0 0

Difference in favour of Scott, - L.359 6 1

At the balance of Whitsunday, 1807, the capital of Scott amounted to - L.3,631 10 11
 Capital of Ballantyne, - 3,618 11 11

Difference in favour of Scott, L.12 19 0

At the Martinmas balance, 1807—
 Scott's capital, - L.3,702 17 6
 Ballantyne's capital, - 3,552 3 11

Difference in favour of Scott, L.150 13 7

At the Whitsunday balance, 1808—
 Ballantyne's capital, - L.3,768 17 7

Difference in favour of Ballantyne, L.18 1 6

This abstract of ours, after viewing the entire premises—both sides of the books—shews a somewhat different result from that with which Mr Lockhart, last year, confounded us. But readers who are curious should peruse both the pamphlets, and judge for themselves; and whatever mercy they may have for Lockhart, they need, as to figures, feel none for the Ballantyne Trustees, who are acute men of business, conversant with accounts, and not at all liable to be mistaken or misled.

They thus carry the statement beyond our brief abstract into later years:—

From May to November, 1808, he, James, is credited with L.600, borrowed by him from his brother Alexander, and advanced to the company, and with his share of profits, L.502 : 17 : 4; and he is debited with his drafts, L.546 : 11 : 7, and with his share (two-thirds) of his brother John's salary, L.133 : 6 : 8.

Lastly, in the year from November 1808 to November 1809, he is credited with his share of profits, L.1100 : 3 : 4; and he is debited with his drafts, L.1150 : 16 : 7, and also with L.300, drawn by him to repay a debt due by himself to his brother John.

On the 25th of November, 1809, the amount of capital belonging to him, and standing at his credit was L.3,831 : 3 : 5. Of this capital, L.1900 consisted of cash advanced by him subsequent to the commencement of the company, by means of loans which he had obtained as an individual, and for which he was personally responsible.

The gross unfairness of Mr Lockhart's representation is thus apparent. Suppressing all mention of the outstanding debts due to Mr Ballantyne at the commencement of the copartnership, and carried into the company's books, in order to be collected and accounted for to him,*

* Mr Lockhart does allow that there were book debts, but he cannot tell what proportion of them was paid; and his style of inference does not lead him to conclude that any, much less all, were paid.

Mr Lockhart assumes that he was entitled to credit for nothing but his share of profits, and that these profits were all that he was entitled to draw for. Mr Lockhart, accordingly, after stating the profits at L.3,936 : 9 : 10, and the drafts at L.5,963 : 12 : 3, exclaims triumphantly, that "the careful and prudent tradesman, James, had overdrawn his share by no less than L.2,027 : 2 : 5."

In order to remove every vestige of obscurity or misunderstanding on this point, we give the following abstract of what Mr Ballantyne was entitled to draw, and actually did draw, during the period in question. It exhibits a very different result from that of the partial and garbled statement of Mr Lockhart.

Instead of L.2,027 : 2 : 5, as stated by Mr Lockhart!

This may suffice as a specimen of the manner in which Mr Lockhart deals with the books of the company; and, without going deeper into the matter, we shall merely give the commentary on this period.

Mr Lockhart gives the particulars for the first two years only, being the periods most favourable for his own view; but it will be observed, that Mr Scott's drafts after that period increased yearly, and in 1809 were upwards of L.200 above his share of profits.

We are now arrived at Martinmas, 1809, when the balance-sheet shewed that the capital of both partners was equal, Scott's being L.3,842, 9s. 8d., Ballantyne's, L.3,841 : 3 : 5. This fact is ascertained by a minute signed by both parties, in which it is declared that

The accounts should be closed, and their amounts, forming together the sum of L.7,684, considered as the permanent capital stock of the company, invested in buildings and materials, whereof each partner possesses one-half. It was further determined that the divisible profit on the trade should be, and remain until altered in another written minute in this book signed by both parties, L.1350 annually; whereof L.900, being two-thirds, should be paid to James Ballantyne, and L.450, being one-third, to Walter Scott, Esquire; and that the further balance of profit arising on the trade should remain for the discharge of additions to stock made within the current year in the first place, and thereafter to accumulate towards the permanent capital stock.

But there was a wheel within a wheel here. The company was by this time in debt L.3,000 to "the moneyed partner," Mr Scott, who had chosen to become the company's banker himself. Scott was not in those days a rich man—very far from it—but Ballantyne beginning without much capital, had still considerable personal debts upon him; and, by 1807, the stock and buildings of the company had been greatly enlarged with its increasing business. Accordingly, two years previously, on the 31st November, 1807, Scott wrote John Ballantyne a rather extraordinary letter, of which this is an extract:—

When we see how the difference between his [James'] stock and mine stands, a considerable part, if not the whole of the balance, should bear 15 per cent. in my favour.

In general, when a partner is applied to for his individual security, it should, I think, be optional to him to be the banker himself, if it suits his convenience better than to give a security. Bankers' interest seldom comes lower, with one charge or another, including renewals, than L.6 or L.7; and though, to a partner, the company pays L.15, yet a proportion of the balance is out of his own pocket, in as far as it diminishes his interest in the free profit. On the other hand, while bills belonging to the company are discountable without such security, or if the company, on its own credit, can procure a stationary loan at L.5 per cent., it would be unjust that a partner should force a loss upon them. I mention this because I shall have a large sum of money to dispose of at Whitsunday, and the state of my family requires that I make the most of it I can. What Ballantyne and Co. have no occasion for, I will probably employ in some literary speculation.

To cut a long story short, Mr Scott, acting upon this alleged right of a "moneyed partner," which Ballantyne, whatever his private opinion might be, had no means to resist, did advance L.3,000, for which he drew, in what he calls "commuted profit," or "trade interest," L.450 per annum during the period that the ridden company continued his debtor. But this is not, to simple Christians, the most Jewish feature of the transaction, managed by the poor, simple, easy, credulous Mr Scott, whose mind, according to Mr Lockhart, was ever wrapt in fiction and romance, ever in the clouds, while James Ballantyne cheated and pillaged him on all hands. Of this L.3,000 Mr Scott had obtained L.1200, in loan, from his brother, Major Scott, for which the said Major held a security over the company's premises in the Canongate. But by what right, legal or equitable, could Mr Scott exact 15 per cent. for this money? How many notes of admiration would Mr Lockhart require to express his sense of Scott putting ten per cent. in his pocket for no reason save that he had the power; giving his brother the legal rate of five per cent. which, with excellent security, was all he was entitled to, and pocketing the surplus. This L.3,000 was, the Trustees say, long afterwards, charged wholly against Ballantyne—not the company—as a debt due to Scott, when the second copartnery commenced. But a farther beauty attends this transaction, and completely illustrates the whole nature and scope of Sir Walter Scott's long connexion with the Ballantynes, and, in particular, his copartnery with James. He who had the lion's strength and power, all along drew the lion's share of the spoils. Both brothers—and both in spite of whatever weaknesses it suits Mr Lockhart to correctly to impute, or unfairly to exaggerate—were well-educated, able, and accomplished men, else they had never been chosen as the confidants and instruments of Scott's various schemes and speculations:—both brothers enjoyed much of his regard—James necessarily the largest share of his esteem, while for his "little Picaroon,"* his pliant facile instrument, he appears to have felt a really cordial and genial affection. Yet his impression—the feeling upon which he acted from first to last—appears to have been, "If these clever, pleasant Ballantynes—without whose assistance it is impossible for me to carry out my secret plans of gain, as a printer and publisher—make a respectable living, it is all very well. I brought James to Edinburgh with certain views; and I will use both of them handsomely and liberally while they serve my purposes: but, I am their patron, their feudal superior; for me they must labour; through me and by me they must live." And never had chief more faithful and devoted vassals. If James Ballantyne perceived, as he must have done, the strange mixture—as Byron strongly, if unjustly, said of Burns—"of dirt and deity," in his great patron, he long kept the discovery to himself; long, but not always. John worshipped, or idolized and incensed him throughout, with probably such a shrewd guess about some parts of the character of the writer of the mysterious correspondence,† labelled, "Open not—read not," as so quick an observer, with all his love and veneration, could not fail to make. Mr Lockhart tells, that Sir Walter, after John's death, had to pay a personal debt for him. We shall hereafter see that the proba-

* An illustration of Mr Lockhart's extreme want of fairness may be aptly found in the frequent and insulting use of the epithet Picaroon, as applied by Scott to John Ballantyne. So far as the world knows, it was never used by Scott—though it may have been his som de caresse for his tool—but once, in a piece of doggerel, probably copied out of John's famous MS. volume, "Open not—read not;" i. e. Sir Walter's private and confidential correspondence with himself, which Sir Walter carried away after John's funeral. The amusing doggerel verses run thus, in reply to John counselling an honest avowal.

"No, John, I will not own the book.
I want, you Picaroon!
When next I try St Grubby's brook,
The A. of W. shall bait the hook:
And flat-fish bite as soon
As if before them they had got
The worn-out wriggler

Walter Scott."

Now, what would Mr Lockhart, what, at least, would any candid man, say, if a biographer of Scott were from this to take him at his own modest estimate, as Lockhart regularly does James Ballantyne, and describe him as a Grub-Street baiter for gudgeons—a worn-out wriggler, and so forth—yet the cases are exactly parallel?

† Why does not Mr Lockhart publish Scott's letters thus labelled by John Ballantyne? They were, it appears, carried away by Sir Walter on the day of John's funeral. Mr Lockhart says they are Sir Walter's property. Common sense would say they were the property of John Ballantyne's heirs and trustees; as they must be the only vouchers, now remaining, for his probity, so grossly attacked; and, in any way a very great literary curiosity.

is, that Scott owed John money.—To return to our illustration of the nature of “commuted profits”—Scott borrowed £1200 from his brother at 5 per cent., (for which the company granted heritable security,) and drew 15 per cent. for it as “trade interest.” James, to keep up his share of the stock, &c., required, about this period, also to borrow, and, among other sums, £1000 from his brother, Alexander; for which loan he received the company’s personal security. Scott seems to have been dissatisfied with this, and we find him writing, in September, 1814: “I own I think it questionable how far money borrowed for the advantage of a partner ought to be guaranteed by the company.” How many thousands were afterwards guaranteed by the company for the sole use of the Laird of Abbotsford? But there was here all the difference between “My bull goring your Honour’s cow; and your Honour’s bull goring my cow.” Ballantyne seems to have been at this time not a little nettled at Scott; and his letter to his brother upon the occasion, is very characteristic of the individual. It is besides illustrative of his relative position with Scott. After quoting his partner’s opinion, for the information of his brother, he proceeds—

“I shall answer —” [Scott’s] letter triumphantly. He talks of it as ‘an improper transaction.’ Why, sir, he has, at this moment, an obligation from us in his possession, binding us to give his brother security over the printing-office, for money advanced as part of his stock, and for which he regularly received 15 per cent. That plain tale should put him down, methinks. For here he receives this enormous interest as a partner running all risks; and he takes an obligation for a security which would prevent the possibility of his running any risk. How that should be a wrong transaction applied to my brother, which he thought a right one when applied to his brother, my blunt intellects cannot see. So, no more of this. I rest here, that you cannot lose in the long run. You have, as above said, the bills of the company; and the company can pay.

“Most assuredly, you can draw interest at only 5 per cent.”

James’s “triumphant answer” produced a reply from Scott, not yielding his ground, but admitting that Alexander, if he chose to insist for his money from his brother James, might bring down the house; but that this would do him little honour:—and of Alexander doing this, Mr Scott could have had no serious apprehensions. James, whose courage at this time seems to have been screwed above the ordinary pitch, ventured a manly rejoinder to Scott’s letter, in which, among other reasons for wishing to give his brother ample security, he states—

“The application of the money was nothing to him [Alexander.] He gave it to the firm upon the security of the firm. But this may seem only to exculpate him, leaving me still chargeable with the blame of giving the company’s security for a sum advanced for my private advantage. Now, as to this, it could not possibly occur to me that I was doing wrong; because the fact was before my eyes, that you had yourself demanded and obtained, and actually held, an obligation to vest the property of the printing office in your brother, Major Scott, as security for a sum advanced by him to you, and by you to the business in the way of loan, for which the trade-interest of 15 per cent. was regularly paid to your order, and for the arrears of which you have, of course, an accumulating claim at this moment. Here then was the company’s heritable security impledged (for the obligation to impledge was, I presume, equivalent to an actual impledging) for a debt borrowed, certainly ‘for the benefit of a partner,’ and actually, for a period, productive of very considerable advantage to that partner. I am ready to own, that I may be entirely mistaken in my inference; but I must really say, that I am at present wholly unable to perceive the nicest shade of distinction between the two cases. Yours led the way in point of priority of time; and, when you demanded the security, I well remember the unhesitating cheerfulness with which I gave it.”

We give Mr James Ballantyne, all circumstances considered, some credit for this bold-speaking; but Scott, as usual, prevailed. James had wished to give his brother security over his own dwelling-house in St John’s Street, his little Abbotsford; but of this, Mr Scott, would not hear. It was, he affirmed, giving Alexander an improper preference over the other creditors. This principle, however, he totally forgot when he afterward alienated Abbotsford, though the company-debts were then more than doubled. Alexander Ballantyne was ultimately compelled to accept merely the personal security of James. A very beautiful and touching letter from James to his younger brother, announces Mr Scott’s determination and James’ sorrowful submission. Alexander, for his brother’s sake, at once acquiesced. There are other points of the Trustees’ refutation of Mr Lockhart’s allegations in pecuniary matters, which we regard as perfectly satisfactory, but to which we cannot now advert, and we come to the establishment of the publishing business, of which Scott was as much the sole projector and author as he was the author of Waverley. It is in vain for Mr Lockhart, while the “Life of Scott” which he has written is before the world, to labour that point. The printing business was, at this time, yielding above £2,000 a-year. And though James Ballantyne might grudge, for a loan of £3,000 to pay £450 a-year, “commuted profit,” or “trade interest,” (words which may henceforward enrich the Jew’s vocabulary,) he had still a very handsome income, and every reason to be contented as he was. John Ballantyne, who had come to Edinburgh, and who merely received a competent salary as a clerk in the printing office, might have had some ambition to turn ostensible publisher, but with James every rational inducement lay the other way. But both John and James were wax in the hands of Scott, though the former might be most willing, probably, to receive the bibliopolic impression. The publishing concern, as Lockhart has fully shewn—either of purpose, or by inadvertence—took its rise in a quarrel between Scott, and Constable and his partner, Hunter; and in Scott’s dislike of the Edinburgh Review, for which its editors had certainly given him some cause. And, not improbably, he believed that a publishing house might turn out quite as productive as the good black milch cow in the Canongate, now yielding him, for no very large advances, above £700 a-year of fair profit, besides his £450 of “commuted profit,” or “trade interest.”

Lockhart says, in the Life—

"He had, long before this, cast a shrewd and penetrating eye over the field of literary enterprise, and developed in his own mind the outlines of many extensive plans, which wanted nothing but the command of a sufficient body of able subalterns to be carried into execution with splendid success." That the establishment of a publishing house was one of those extensive plans which owed its existence to Scott's survey of the field of literary enterprise, is substantially admitted by Mr Lockhart himself; while he endeavours to lay upon the shoulders of the subalterns the failure of the undertaking, though it appears, even from his own narrative, that Scott, from the first to the last, directed its operations, projected all its unfortunate speculations, and exercised an absolute control over its management.

We are now quoting the pamphlet, from which we borrow further:—

Mr Lockhart ascribes the commencement of the quarrel to "a soreness originating in the recent conduct of Mr Jeffrey's journal," the great primary source of the wealth and authority of the house of Constable. Mr Murray of London had had the sagacity to prognosticate the coming squalls, and to take advantage of them by cultivating a connexion with the Edinburgh printing house. He learned that "a new publishing house in Edinburgh, in opposition to Constable, was all but matured;" and that "Scott had chalked out the design of an Edinburgh Annual Register, to be conducted in opposition to the politics and criticism of Constable's Review."

The Ballantyne Trustees refer to a letter of Scott's to his friend Mr Morrit, published by Lockhart, proving, what requires no proof, that the publishing house "was entirely the emanation of his brain," and giving "his own distinct account of its origin." "Mr Lockhart himself admits," say they, "Life, vol. ii., page 223, 'that the new bookselling house in Edinburgh was begun in the shortsighted heat of pique.'"

But this is not enough. Mr Lockhart himself has said sufficient to shew, that this bookselling house was one of those extensive plans of enterprise which had long lain in embryo in the mind of Scott, and that it was warmed into birth by the spirit of animosity and revenge towards Constable and Company.

The Trustees, in our opinion, labour this point a great deal more than is necessary. Mr Lockhart may dumfounder persons who "are not admirers of figures," with James Ballantyne's apparently enormous overdrawings; but Mr Lockhart himself is authority enough for Scott having both commenced and ruined the publishing-house; dragging James Ballantyne and the printing-office into the vortex, in spite of any feeble resistance that James durst make. Mr Lockhart has, in the Life, abundantly displayed the folly of Scott's publishing speculations. He has also, incidentally, discovered the alarm and distress of James Ballantyne at different periods; and, indeed, from the commencement of this disastrous concern. How can Mr Lockhart then, after publishing such things as the following, justify to himself the uncandid, ungenerous, and unrighteous exposure which he has made of James Ballantyne, in the abject posture of a humble suitor to the man who had been the sole cause—we advisedly repeat it!—the sole cause of his pecuniary embarrassments, for leave to marry?

There is, to many minds, something pitiful as well as most pitiable in the letter which Lockhart has published, as addressed by Ballantyne to Scott, throwing himself upon the mercy of his "generous creditor," and humbly begging to be relieved, penniless and in debt, from certain consequences of the heavy involvements into which the folly of that "generous creditor" had plunged him; but knowing, as Lockhart must well do, by whom James Ballantyne (with more than his alleged pomposities, whether of pocket or manner) had been placed in this painful and humiliating plight in relation to Scott, it really required a callousness and audacity to give that letter to the world on which we forbear to comment. Well must Mr Lockhart have known why the man who, from the real business which he had established, and conducted in a skilful and masterly manner—however he may have managed the uncongenial duty of paper-kite flyer in which he was unhappily involved—the man, we repeat, who, in 1809, before the publishing trade began, was realising above L.1400 a-year from a sound and healthy increasing trade, was, in 1816, compelled to write that supplicatory letter which he has thought fit to make public. Fortunately for Mr Lockhart's personal feelings, and for the memory of the dead, his opponents have shewn a very remarkable degree of forbearance. It is enough for the present that we express our belief that Scott himself could in no circumstances have sanctioned such an act as this; though we are far from thinking that he acted a very generous part in the matter.

How completely the fortunes of James Ballantyne were ruined at this time, by the wild and headstrong speculations of Scott, Mr Lockhart has clearly demonstrated. After mentioning several useless unsaleable works which Scott had made be printed and published, he says in the Life—

"The publishing firm was as yet little more than a twelve-month old, and already James began to apprehend that some of their mightiest undertakings would wholly disappoint Scott's prognostications. He speaks with particular alarm of the edition of Beaumont and Fletcher's Plays, of which Weber had now dismissed several volumes from his incompetent and presumptuous hand. How Scott could ever have countenanced the project of an edition of an English book of this class by a mere drudging German, appears to me quite inexplicable. . . . James Ballantyne augurs, and well might he do so, not less darkly as to 'the Aston speculation'—that is, the bulky collection entitled 'Tixall Poetry.' 'Over this,' he says, 'the (Edinburgh) review of the Sadler has thrown a heavy cloud—the fact is, it seems to me to have ruined it. Here is the same editor and the same printer, and your name withdrawn. I hope you agree with John and me that this Aston business ought to be got rid of at almost any sacrifice. We could not now even ask a London bookseller to take a share; and a net outlay of near L.2,500 upon a worse than doubtful speculation, is surely 'most tolerable and not to be endured.'"

Lockhart, in the Life, enumerates other mad and ruinous speculations in publishing, in which James Ballantyne was compelled to take his share. On the Annual Register alone, the loss was estimated by Constable, when Scott would fain have made it over to him, at "never less than L.1000 a-year." "These," say the Ballantyne Trustees, "are pretty good specimens of the judgment and success with which Scott directed the publishing speculations of John Ballantyne and Co."

The above failures, enumerated by Mr Lockhart himself, were heavy enough of themselves to weigh down the concern; but many other books were published under the same guidance, and with equally bad success. Among these was a collection called "Tales of the East," in three ponderous volumes; a similar volume of "Popular Tales," an edition of Defoe in twelve volumes; "Ferguson's Astronomy;" "A General View of the County of Dumfries;" and others, which were found to be unsaleable, and remained a dead stock in the hands of the publishers.

Could a concern, so conducted, possibly prosper? The drain of capital, caused by this load of unsaleable publications, was enormous. All was outlay; and, as nothing came in, heavy engagements were entered into, which could only be met by kite-flying, the sole resource in such circumstances. When the affairs of the bookselling-house were so disastrous, it is obvious that the printing concern, so closely connected with it, and composed of the same partners, must have equally suffered from the connexion. The presses of the printing-office were kept constantly at work on the heavy jobs of the publishing concern; but it is easy to see that, when the publishers were labouring to meet their engagements to strangers, those to their printers would be the last to be provided for. Hence, during the whole subsistence of the bookselling house, the printing concern was saddled with an unprofitable customer, and was not only not paid for its work, but dragged into its customer's embarrassments.

And hence was James Ballantyne, as he states, "by no fault of his own," ruined; and hence his letter, begging Sir Walter to let him off from the farther consequences of the publishing concern, on the terms of surrendering everything, and being Scott's debtor for the £3,000 so often referred to, and which seems, at this period, to have been saddled wholly on him. And Mr Lockhart having exhibited Ballantyne on his knees, to the rash and unpardonable, if involuntary author of his ruin, can vaunt of Scott's generosity in allowing James to escape the further consequences of the publishing business! But Scott, thanks to himself, incurred by this step no fresh losses, and indeed, as we shall see, ensured considerable gain. Probably even by this time he saw his way, and the sure means of getting rid of his load of waste paper.

It was really too bad to give the colour of excessive generosity to the manumission of Ballantyne, especially as Mr Lockhart himself reveals that Scott, now become, as a novelist, more powerful than ever with Constable and the other great publishers, was dexterously taking advantage of his position to foist off all the old trash accumulated while he was a publisher, upon those who were eagerly competing for a new Waverley novel. Very respectable and estimable persons, who understand business better than we pretend to do, assure us that this "foisting off" was all quite fair; and the Ballantyne Trustees certainly seem to see no harm in it. They have only to shew that Scott, after all, managed to sustain no loss by these wild speculations which ruined James Ballantyne. John Ballantyne asserts, that Scott, by taking the whole on himself, was "ultimately paid in full, with a balance of £1000;" and the Ballantyne Trustees state—labour, appears from many circumstances stated by Mr Lockhart himself; and, certainly, if Scott is chargeable with having so deeply involved himself and his partners, he himself had the merit of extricating them. The means by which he did so were simple but effectual. In disposing of his subsequent works, he made it a part of his bargains with the publishers, that they should take a quantity of John Ballantyne and Co.'s stock at a stipulated price; and this he continued to do till the whole of that stock was taken off his hands on advantageous terms.

Thus, his first transaction with Constable, in 1813, was the purchase by Constable of the following articles of John Ballantyne and Co.'s stock:—Considerable portions of Weber's unhappy "Beaumont and Fletcher"—of an edition of De Foe's novels, in twelve volumes—of a collection, entitled "Tales of the East," in three large volumes 8vo, double-columned—and of another in one volume, called "Popular Tales"—about 800 copies of the "Vision of Don Roderick"—and a fourth of the remaining copyright of "Rokeby," price £700." "The immediate accommodation thus received," adds Mr Lockhart, "amounted to £2,000."

The publication of "Guy Ranning" was undertaken by Messrs Longman and Co., "on the terms dictated by Scott—namely, granting bills for £1,500, and relieving John Ballantyne and Co. to the extent of £500."

The first "Tales of my Landlord" were published by Murray and Blackwood, who "also relieved John Ballantyne and Co. of stock to the value of £500." "Scott's letter to John Ballantyne on this occasion, quoted by Lockhart, shews," says the biographer, "how sharply the unseen parent watched this first negotiation of his Jedediah Claphotham."

Thus Mr Scott went on, till he came to bargain with Constable for the second "Tales of my Landlord," when he stipulated that, along with the work, the publisher should take the whole of the remaining stock of John Ballantyne and Co. To this Constable agreed; and, "and," says Mr Lockhart, "at one sweep cleared the Augean stable in Hanover Street of unsaleable rubbish to the amount of £5,270!"—"I am assured by his [Constable's] surviving partner," adds Mr Lockhart, "that when he had finally re-disposed of the stock, he found himself a loser by fully two-thirds of this sum."—Very likely:—but if Scott imposed hard terms on his publishers, by making them take this "unsaleable rubbish" off his hands, let it be remembered that it was "rubbish" of his own making.

It is not altogether to elucidate the Lockhart and Ballantyne controversy that we have cited this passage. It involves, some will say, a question of gentlemanly honour; others, a grave question of morals. Some respectable persons with whom we have conversed upon the subject, justify the transaction as quite fair in trade. Constable and Longman "were wide awake," so at worst it was only "diamond cut diamond." We are tempted at such times to shrug up our shoulders, and thank our stars that we do not understand trade. We confess that the principle of the transaction appears to the ignorant and uninitiated, exactly similar in character to the common trick of a poulterer coupling up a lean stale rabbit with a fresh plump one; and if the purchaser detect the trick, saying, "If you don't take the bad you sha'n't have the good. To-day I command the market." There is this difference: The one is a matter of a couple of shillings, managed by a peddling dealer: the other involves pecuniary gain or loss to the amount of thousands of pounds; but it involves, besides, genius, literature, nice gentlemanly honour, elevated feeling,—it was managed by by Sir Walter Scott. On the whole, the Ballantyne family may congratulate themselves, that though James, as a publisher, was ruined, Scott ultimately lost nothing by the publishing firm ; and yet, we think, they need not envy him the negotiations which led to this result. This, however, is a point on which we shall probably be at issue with two-thirds of the world ; so we pass to another branch of the controversy, simply remarking, that Scott ultimately suffered no loss by the publishing business. But he must also have gained considerably, since, for six years, it made him the sole printer, the entire Ballantyne and Co., drawing all the large profits of that business, while poor Ballantyne expiated the folly or necessity of becoming Scott's partner in publishing, on the conditions which Mr Lockhart so handsomely describes ; and as " Scott's salaried servant " at L.400, where he had lately made L.1400. When James became his late partner's " salaried servant " of all work, John became a thriving auctioneer and dealer in articles of vertu ; still, however, frequently acting as negotiator and kite-flyer for Sir Walter, and giving him occasional accommodation. How the balances ultimately stood between them at John's death, it is not easy to unravel. " The eminent men of business," Gibson-Craigs, Wardlaw, &c., who wound up John's affairs, made Sir Walter his debtor ; and Sir Walter, accordingly, paid a balance to John's Trustees, which it is quite fair to infer, if John had owed him, he would have withheld.

Mr Lockhart, who is ever most unhappy in the style of his jokes, seems to think he has for ever demolished John, when, from some new discovery, he has stigmatized him as a tailor ; and, in early life, a bankrupt,—all of which statements are very unnecessarily, we think, proved by the Trustees to be untrue. It was really not worth while, since, whatever he might have been, he was the bosom confidant, the really beloved, if not greatly esteemed friend of Scott, who could certainly, at any time, have better spared many a better man. There is nothing more pathetic in the entire Life than Lockhart's description of Sir Walter standing in the Canon-gate churchyard, on the fitful or gloomy day on which John Ballantyne was buried, and whispering in the ear of the individual who has heaped insult upon the memory of his friends the Ballantynes—" I feel as if there would be less sunshine for me from this day forth !" Alas, this was too true foreboding !

John Ballantyne, there is abundant evidence, when no longer connected with Scott in business, still, as we have stated, gave him his services, and obliged him with what is called accommodation ; and, by his will, he left L.2,000 to build a library at Abbotsford ! This was the last of John's acts of munificence and gratitude towards Abbotsford ; but unluckily the money was not forthcoming on this occasion, as Mr Lockhart fails not to shew. The Italians have a proverb, " When the poor give to the rich, the devil laughs." We leave Mr Lockhart to make the application,* when he reflects on John Ballantyne's gifts and offerings.

Let us return to James Ballantyne's case. For six years he continued the " salaried servant " of the Great Unknown printer, Sir Walter Scott, accepting bills in the name of the moonshine Ballantyne and Co. to the amount of L.36,000 !

Sir Walter seems to have been exceedingly strict as a man of business, where the poor man's bull gored his Honour's cow. We do not pretend to much knowledge of business usages ; but if the " salaried servant," or first clerk of the house of Murray, or Longmans, or Colburn, sinking the real names, the true firm, did, in his own name, or as John Doe and Company, or anything else, accept and indorse bills to an immense amount, we can guess at what would be said of it by men of business. Ballantyne and Company, printers, were, for six years, while Scott was sole proprietor of the printing-office, a thing of straw ; but the " salaried servant," who reaped not a farthing of the profits, was, all this while, we apprehend, bound to the last farthing he was worth, for the prodigious amounts to which he affixed the fictitious signature of Ballantyne and Co. We submit that there was something loose and unbusiness-like in this manner of going on, and something unfair to the " salaried servant," on whom such risks were imposed ; and yet Sir Walter could be most strict and rigid.

In the course of that period, James, on one occasion, used the " firm signature " to a bill given as part-payment of the debt due to his brother Alexander, mentioned in page 662. Upon this Mr Lockhart rears up very formidable charges ; and Sir Walter Scott had probably been as deeply displeased as the occasion justified, though not exactly on the grounds specified by Lockhart. By oversight or accident, this bill, purporting to be of Ballantyne and Co., when due, was what is called dishonoured, and the fact came to the knowledge of Scott, who, as a wholesale dealer in accommodation bills, stood on very delicate grounds with the bankers. It is this accidental noting, and not the accepting of the bill with the signature of the firm, (which he was so much in the habit of signing, that he must, we think, have in any case used it instinctively,) that James Ballantyne, in a deprecatory letter to the alarmed and angry Sir Walter, terms discreditable; which epithet, Mr Lockhart, who publishes the letter, ingeniously distorts to mean James's guilty use of the firm's signature. This, again, we consider one of those minor points in which vindication of the memory of Ballantyne, acting in entire good faith, as even Lockhart admits, was hardly needed. But commercial people make much of such transactions.

* Among the many diverting stories for which the " Nether Whig and Radical circles," of " prying curious Edinburgh," are indebted to the good taste and prudence of Mr Lockhart, is the retort of John Ballantyne's widow, in her vindication of her husband in the newspapers. Among the many acts of extravagance which Scott's biographer has scored up against " Mr Rigdum," " the Auctioneer," " the Tailor," the " Snip of Kelso," " the Picaroon," &c. &c., he is reminded by Mrs John Ballantyne, that he has totally omitted one, which is, we admit, of a rather flagrant character. Where an ordinary gossip would have been contented to present an infant with a silver pap-spoon, nothing less than gold would satisfy the munificent and tasteful dealer in articles of vertu in the case of Lockhart's child ! Now Mrs John Ballantyne was at least as justifiable in reminding Mr Lockhart of the presentation of the gold spoon or spoons, as he could be in enumerating some other of " Johnny Rigdum's " acts of extravagance, and in blazoning James Ballantyne's boy's rocking-horse and gold counters.

In 1822, John Ballantyne being dead, on James devolved the sole task of bill-monger for the Laird of Abbotsford, the printer in the Canongate; and in that year "the salaried servant" of the Great Unknown printer, became—and in the face of L.36,000 of floating bills!—once more his partner. The conditions and stipulations were dictated by Scott himself, in a document as remarkable for foresight, keenness, pursuit of every advantage, and general stringency on the part of the "moneyed partner," as any ever issued from the sharpest attorney's office. It alone proves that there were certain occasions in which Sir Walter was not "too much occupied with his own romantic creations, to have time for minute scrutiny of his commercial affairs." And these times were pretty constant with him, however it might have been with the indolent Ballantyne, who "disliked figures," and who was slow, or, more properly, reluctant, in all business, save his proper business—that of a printer and editor—which he ably discharged.

James Ballantyne's trustees having shewn that he had appropriated no money from the company's funds to his own purposes during the first copartnery, which was not his own, prove completely, that, during the second copartnery, (as well as the long interval in which Scott was sole printer,) the printing-office was taxed to an unwarrantable extent to supply the increasing demands of Abbotsford. The good milch-cow in the Canongate, as we shall see, was now continually drained by the devouring wants of that lordly establishment. Before the second disastrous copartnery was entered into by Ballantyne, the floating bills of Ballantyne and Co. amounted to L.36,000, of which a comparatively small part belonged properly to the printing-office; and demands of all kinds and descriptions continued to be paid on account of Sir Walter by his partner, as formerly by his "salaried servant." Builders, founders, painters, plumbers, came for payment to the Canongate, for the cottage of Abbotsford was now rising into a castle. Wine-merchants, grocers, butchers, milliners, the joint-stock companies—in many of which, madnesses of the time Sir Walter speculated—all came to the printer, to Ballantyne and Co., for cash or bills, and were paid to an extent of prodigality which leaves the world to wonder that Sir Walter held out so long. In three years and a-half, the expense of discounts and stamps on his accommodation-bills—those kites flown in the name of Ballantyne and Co., but proved here to have been solely for Scott's private accommodation, else had he not been individually liable for the discounts—amounted to L.8,085! In these same years, (1823-4-5) we find that the printing-office had paid in advance, on account of Sir Walter Scott personally, L.15,208, 4s. 3d.; the amount paid out on his account being L.48,289: 18: 2, and that paid in to his credit, L.33,083: 13: 9. Ballantyne ought to have had a good salary: as the town-agent of Abbotsford, although he had run no risks. The accounts of that establishment, as partially brought to light by Mr Lockhart's labours, will long remain a statistical curiosity. Ballantyne was the universal paymaster, from (to borrow, or rather humbly to imitate, Mr Lockhart's dignified style) L.5 for Terence Magrath's lessons in warbling, to L.5,000 for Lieutenant Scott's commission! To say that this came out of James Ballantyne's pocket, although much of it was at the risk of the printing company, would be about as absurd and barefaced as Mr Lockhart's repeated averments that the printing company never advanced one penny for Scott, while, for his personal extravagance, Ballantyne at all times lavishly drew upon its funds.

In the "Humbug Handled," Mr Lockhart has invidiously and disingenuously selected a few items of expenditure from Ballantyne's private cash-jottings, intended to exhibit the extravagant habits of the man, and moreover his reckless, if not dishonest, appropriation of the company's money;—somewhat lavishly spent we admit his money was—though it was his own—and also absurdly or ostentatiously jotted down. Mr Lockhart, besides several sums for costly furniture, mentions much wine, and several horses purchased by Ballantyne; but forgets to tell that some of the wine was for friends, and, as the same jot-book shewed, was paid for by them; and that if several gig horses were bought they were also re-sold. Part of the wine, we make no doubt, nay, a good deal, flowed freely enough at those novel-launching dinners, given for the glory of Sir Walter and the good of the concern, which Mr Lockhart has facetiously commemorated, and at which he must have assisted. Mr Lockhart has studiously picked out, it would appear, from James Ballantyne's private books, whatever sums look most absurd, or tell against him, and as studiously suppressed the per contra. Mr Lockhart—bred in the good school of his father's (a Scottish Presbyterian minister's,) family, families generally highly respectable, and seldom or never very rich—cannot admire frugality more than we do. It is the tap-root, in our expensive and struggling society, of everything like personal independence—the mother and guardian of many virtues. No man's observation can have placed the value of economy in a stronger light than Mr Lockhart's may have done; and we are far indeed from blaming him for condemning expensive or extravagant habits in James Ballantyne, or in any man, if they be really such in the particular circumstances of the individual, and if the exposure is fairly, not invidi-ously made. But the rocking-horse and the pony for the boy, and the gig-horses, and the wine, and the glass, and the seven sovereigns for a sick child to play with, certainly not to chuck over his nursery window—and these are the greatest of Ballantyne's enormities—fade into insignificance when compared with the sums passing through his fingers, from the funds of the company, on account of his partner. In the three years that Ballantyne was spending at this furious rate—at rocking-horse speed—he also paid out for Scott, (generally by bills of Ballantyne and Co. for from L.300 to L.400 each,) to the amount of L.7,246 for work done at Abbotsford; to Terry, for purchases for Abbotsford, of what Lockhart terms nick-nackatories, L.606; and for Lieutenant Scott's commission, L.5,349—a temptation to, and no bad offset, for the extravagance of his own son's rocking-horse and pony, which together cost L.14! But these sums are far indeed from being so really extravagant in principle, to a man embarrassed as was Scott by floating bills, now increased to the amount of perhaps L.40,000, as some of the seemingly more trifling items. They were once for all. The others were of the nature of continual drains. Poor Sir Walter's candle was, at this period, flaring at both ends, and running to waste in the middle. What income, we submit to nice calculators, would an elderly gentleman require—who was thus involved in debt, and whose income must terminate with his life—to support the style of living which Scott did then? Within about four months, we find Ballantyne paying for a family, where the ladies were a mother and an unmarried daughter, about L.350 to dress-makers alone. In 1823, we find Ballantyne paying to Mitchell and Heriot, straw-hat-makers, L.50: 8s. Why, the large Civil List of Queen Victoria could not stand this rate of expenditure, if carried into everything. Yet this is but a thing of straw; only one L.50. In less than two years, we find Ballantyne paying, on account of wine for Abbotsford, nett L.986: 17s. And all this while, independently of every other source of expense, of every other domestic drain, upon a corresponding scale, (of which these things are samples,) there was nearly L.3,000 a-year of discounts to be paid on the bills, for which Sir Walter every month suggested the means of raising the wind to his unfortunate agent, Ballantyne. From their monthly correspondence, as given in the pamphlet, he appears to have known far better about these flying bills than James, who was the prominent person, and whom he often reminds of omissions, and sets to rights. On one occasion, we find him cautioning Ballantyne about the colour of the ink used in filling up his cut-and-dry bills; as bankers were very suspicious in such cases. From this monthly correspondence, many things transpire, which whet curiosity about the precious MS. volume—“Open not—read not.”

In the Life, Mr Lockhart gravely stated, that Sir Walter was unacquainted with the enormous amount of the bills, and of his liabilities for thousands and tens of thousands as a printer in the Canongate. Driven from this by irrefragable proof that Sir Walter was better acquainted with the amount of his liabilities than his agent, Ballantyne, Mr Lockhart next asserts that it was the application of the proceeds of which he was kept ignorant; of Mr James Ballantyne “squandering the proceeds.” We must here quote, from the “Reply,” a passage which it will not be easy for Mr Lockhart either to parry or answer:—

Does this absurdity require a serious answer? Will any one in his senses believe that Scott, with this enormous and daily increasing mass of bills, for which he was responsible, constantly before his eyes, never once dreamt of their application—never once considered for what purpose they were granted? Will anybody imagine for a moment that Scott, after planning so carefully the means of meeting engagements, amounting, as we have seen, to ten thousand pounds or upwards, in a single month, should dismiss the matter from his mind, and return to “his romantic creations,” without once troubling himself to inquire whether the resources, which it cost him so much trouble and anxiety to provide, were applied to necessary purposes, or whether they merely furnished funds to be squandered by James Ballantyne?

Mr Lockhart's next resource is to endeavour to make it appear that Scott had no occasion to use the firm of James Ballantyne and Co., in order to raise money for his purposes, “because there were personal resources at his command, out of which the price of his land, and the expense of his household could be paid.”

These resources, according to Mr Lockhart, were Sir Walter's private fortune, his official income, and his profits as an author.

The first and second of these heads may be dismissed in three words. Scott had very little private fortune; and his official income, by Mr Lockhart's own statement, did not exceed L.1600 a-year—a mere nothing when talked of as supplying his enormous expenditure.

As to his literary profits, though they make an immense figure on paper, they were, during the latter part of his career, in a great measure illusory. They consisted of bills granted by Constable and Co., a great many of which were never paid. When they became due, they were renewed over and over again; and, at last, when Constable and Co.'s crash came, an immense mass of these bills for literary profits realized a dividend of one shilling and threepence per pound. The money that could be got upon these bills from the bankers, was used in keeping afloat the general mass of engagements—which mass of engagements, accordingly, they contributed to swell.

A single passage of Mr Lockhart's own speaks volumes on this subject. “Before the ‘Fortunes of Nigel,’ issued from the press, (which was in 1821,) Scott had exchanged instruments, and received his booksellers' bills, for no less than FOUR ‘works of fiction’—not one of them otherwise described in the deeds of agreement—to be produced in unbroken succession, each of them to fill at least three volumes, but with proper saving clauses as to increase of copy-money, in case any of them run to four.” Was such a monstrous anticipation of literary profits ever before heard of? And what could have led to a course of proceeding so unprecedented, so recklessly imprudent, and so full of peril to the author and publisher? What could have induced Scott to resort to it, but the desire to procure the supplies necessary to meet his own exigencies—to enable him to pay the price of great tracts of unproductive land—to furnish the means for the princely hospitalities of Abbotsford, and to defray the ruinous expense of his modes of raising money? It will not be pretended that it was not Scott himself who transacted with his publishers for four unwritten novels at a time; and if it was Scott himself who dictated to his publishers such extraordinary transactions, by which he stipulated to receive bills for between twenty and thirty thousand pounds for works, not only before a line of them was written, but before their very names had been imagined, is it likely, we again ask, that he should never have bestowed a thought upon what became of these bills when received, but have quietly allowed them to be swallowed up in the gulf of James Ballantyne's extravagance?

Scott's outlay in land, and more land—unproductive land—on which he carried forward expensive improvements in planting, draining, &c., is next noticed; and the pamphlet proceeds, the time referred to being that when Ballantyne again became Scott's partner:—

At the period now in question, (the year 1822,) the greatest part of the house of Abbotsford, (on which as much money was lavished as would have sufficed for the erection of a nobleman's baronial mansion,) with its offices, gardens, and other appurtenances, was in a fair way of being finished. We must add too, the splendid style of hospitality in which he had indulged for some years previous to the time of which we speak, and of which an idea may be formed from the pages of Mr Lockhart's own work. During six months of the year he resided at Abbotsford. The most wealthy of the English nobility are accustomed to entertain large parties of guests at their country mansions at certain periods of the year, such as the Christmas holidays or the commencement of the shooting season, for a few days, or a week or two, perhaps, at a time; but the halls of Abbotsford, for months and months in succession, were filled with parties of noble and distinguished guests, and crowds of pampered servants, while the stables might at any time have mounted a troop of horse. Mr Lockhart, somewhere in his book, speaks of the time when "the new castle was complete and overflowing with all its splendour;"—"but by that time," he adds, "the end also was approaching." No wonder!

Such was the situation of things when, after the formation of the copartnery in 1822, the full statement of the affairs of the company and of its partners, in relation to each other, was drawn up and laid before them by Mr Hogarth. From that time the business went on, till, as our readers are aware, it was terminated by the bankruptcy of all the parties concerned, viz. of James Ballantyne and Co., Constable and Co., and their London correspondents, Hurst, Robinson, and Co.; a catastrophe which took place in January, 1826. Down to that period, the system of bill transactions necessary to keep afloat the load of subsisting liabilities, and to supply the demands of Sir Walter Scott's still increasing expenditure, went on as before.

We cannot take the detailed accounts; and the result is sufficient:—

For this fifteen thousand pounds of personal expenses, incurred during these three years beyond the amount of funds actually received on account of Sir Walter Scott, as well as for the seven thousand pounds of discounts, stamps, interest, exchange, and other expenses incurred in keeping up the pre-existing amount of liabilities, Sir Walter continued, as before, to use the firm of James Ballantyne and Co. in procuring accommodations; and hence arose the amount of their liabilities at the time of the bankruptcy. On all occasions, he made use of James Ballantyne and Co. as the means of supplying his wants. If he wanted money, and they happened to have it, he drew it out; if not, he made use of their firm to raise it. Such was his uniform practice, from the first formation of the company to the last day of its existence. Of Scott's control, activity, and vigilance in managing these transactions, we have already, we think, furnished sufficient specimens.

The reader will find in the Appendix some specimens of the orders and directions for the payment of money on his account, which Sir Walter Scott was in the habit of sending to James Ballantyne.

The nature of some of these payments we have noticed; and to sum up, the Trustees, without proving or attempting to prove that Ballantyne, from 1823 onward, till the crash came, was as economical as he might have been, at least establish that he squandered only his own money. He held the belief that the estate of Abbotsford was between him and ruin from the engagements to which the company were liable on account of Sir Walter Scott. As it is, he seems to have spent L.1500 or L.2,000 of his own money, which, had he been a better economist, might have remained to be swallowed up shortly afterwards by the company's creditors. Ballantyne, we have said, believed, until after the bankruptcy, that Abbotsford, which had absorbed so much, stood between his children and ruin. Then he first learned that it had previously been settled on Sir Walter's eldest son, on this young man's marriage with Miss Jobson. Lockhart contends that James Ballantyne could not have been ignorant of this settlement: but the world has Ballantyne's positive affirmation; and it will take his plain word against Mr Lockhart's ingenious hypothesis of how he should or must have known the fact so important to him, since he was at the wedding supper; and Professor Wilson and some other gentlemen had heard of the settlement, (of which, however, their recollection, we should imagine, cannot be very distinct or fresh;) and, besides, it had been talked of in Constable's shop! All this may be very true, and yet Ballantyne may have remained in perfect ignorance until the truth burst upon him to his utter consternation. Is it not far more extraordinary that neither Mr Lockhart, nor any member of Scott's family, were aware that, for twenty years, he had been Ballantyne's partner? Yet such is the fact.

It is next to impossible that Scott could beforehand have told his partner—the man involved with him to the extent of L.46,000—how he had made away with his available means, till discovery was inevitable. But apart from Ballantyne altogether, and waiving the question of a man with two children unprovided for, settling his fortune upon an elder son, whose commission had already cost him above L.5,000: waiving this affair of the privileges of primogeniture,—for who but a Radical could stoop to such argument? we will more broadly state the question. Had Scott any right, with direct company engagements to the extent, at this time, of L.46,000, and, in consequence of these, collateral liabilities, which, by the failure of the houses of Constable and Co. and of Hurst and Co., became L.88,000,—to alienate his property? Or, in other words, to settle his estate, mansion, &c. &c., upon his eldest son, with the burden of only L.10,000? From his own Diary we learn that his creditors at one time thought not,—and the matter looked serious; but from this his heroic and unparalleled exertions, and a series of lucky hits in the subsequent years, extricated him honourably—though at what cost!

From the pamphlet of the Trustees, it appears, that, in the matter of a mutual discharge between the Trustees of Scott and those of James Ballantyne, which took place after both were in their graves, the agent of the Trustees for Sir Walter's creditors, moved first; whereas Mr Lockhart chooses to represent this as an act of generosity and clemency; the gratuitous quitting of Ballantyne's estate, of vast though vague sums due by James, as formerly by John, to Sir Walter Scott; and which quittance was, as Mr Lockhart states, humbly prayed for by the testamentary trustees of James. The authors of the "Reply" to Mr Lockhart's pamphlet (the "Humbug,") settle this matter at once, and to the satisfaction of every reasonable being, by quoting the opinion of Mr Gibson, the agent of the Trustees of the creditors of Ballantyne and Scott. This opinion was, it appeared, elicited by a letter addressed to Mr Gibson by the present Sir Walter's agent, Mr Isaac Bayley. Mr Bayley states to Mr Gibson:—"Mr Douglas' proposition* for a mutual discharge seems to me quite proper; but before writing Sir Walter's Trustees on the subject, I shall feel obliged by your stating whether you are satisfied that Sir Walter's estate has no claims upon that of Mr Ballantyne." In answer, Mr Gibson immediately wrote:—"They both, (that is Scott and Ballantyne,) raised as much money as they required for their own purposes by accommodation bills or otherwise. All passed through Mr Ballantyne's hands; and his statement to me was that the greater part of it was remitted to [or paid out for] Sir Walter Scott. At an early part of the trust, I suggested to Sir Walter Scott and Mr Ballantyne, that it would be right to have an account between them made up; but neither seemed to think that was either practicable or necessary. I have a strong conviction that Sir Walter Scott NEVER CONSIDERED THAT HE HAD ANY CLAIMS AGAINST MR BALLANTYNE."

Those who give themselves the trouble to investigate, will, we are persuaded, arrive at the same conviction as Mr Gibson. In the year referred to, as in 1816, James Ballantyne was once more willing to surrender all,—and to be quits, feeling, no doubt, that his "patron" had still the power of being most useful to him; and Scott, both in conscience and pride, must have desired oblivion of all these past unhappy matters—all those details of fictitious bills and prodigal expenditure which Lockhart has forced into light.

Mr Lockhart would have the same conviction as Mr Gibson, did he choose to believe Sir Walter Scott's statements, made to himself, which he has published in the Life; and that Sir Walter was a fond enthusiast, either in bountifulness or friendship, the world might once have believed, though Mr Lockhart has rendered that fond visionary belief longer impossible. From the Life, we learn that Lockhart had written a letter of anxious inquiry about the extent of pecuniary injury which his father-in-law might have sustained

* Mr Douglas, W.S., one of the testamentary trustees of James Ballantyne, and one of the authors of the pamphlets; an early friend of both the great parties, a shrewd man of business, and staunch Tory. His proposition was made in consequence of Mr Gibson's previous overtures for a final settlement.

through Ballantyne's failure—Ballantyne, who drew his copy-money! So little did Mrs and Mr Lockhart know of Sir Walter's personal connexion with the printing-office, that, when an alarm about Constable's solvency was given to him in warning by Lockhart, and he set off on a secret midnight journey to ascertain the truth, and returned announcing that "Constable was firm as a rock," Mrs Lockhart was happy enough to imagine that the cause of her father's sudden midnight journey from Abbotsford to Constable's residence must have been from generous anxiety about his early friend, Ballantyne! One could almost envy this state of innocence. Mr Lockhart, we venture to think, did not participate in this happy belief; but he surely might have believed Scott's grave assurance—"I have been far from suffering by James Ballantyne. I owe it to him to say, that his difficulties, as well as his advantages, are owing to me." It may be asked, where were the advantages? Sir Walter might—must have meant good. He would not willingly have prevented it; but his own bold speculations for gain had, first and last, completely frustrated the advantages. Had he forborne the printing copartnery, or even kept his publishing and bill-mongering concerns wholly to himself, and merely given his influence as an author to his most useful and zealous friend, there must have been great advantage. But—beggared in 1816, and left deeply in debt, and bankrupt again in 1826—it is mockery, though Sir Walter himself has done it, to speak of the advantages. It is a fact worthy of remark, that both brothers—the clever "Picaroon" auctioneer as well as the printer; Rigdom Funnidos as well as the more solemn and pompous personage—throve from the hour that their small and insignificant affairs were extricated from the vortex of Abbotsford. James left his young family the means of a respectable up-bringing, acquired during his last few years of independent and unharassed exertion; and of John, the younger brother, if he did squander his gains as an auctioneer, it can only be said that he was an apt scholar in the great school, which, established at Abbotsford, had many more ramifications than in John's Kelso and Trinity villas, and James' house in Heriot Row. It was then the era of profusion and rapacity; of wild speculation and joint-stock companies. The half of the leading and fashionable families of Edinburgh were, at this period seized with the epidemic madness of ostentatious and extravagant living. The genius, and the more marvellous energy and industry of Scott, finally bore his house above the flood, where many others fell and were swept away, to appear no more. Few, indeed, of the illustrious of those days escaped, save himself, and those who had a permanent resource in well-paid public appointments. We wish that Mr Lockhart—who so well understands the folly and danger of tradesmen, and of W.S.'s, and, indeed, any class of men living above their means, and keeping whether gigs or carriages, with all sorts of hobby and rocking horses—would write the Domestic Chronicles of Edinburgh during these wild years succeeding the King's visit, when Scott and Constable, and, in a smaller way, the Ballantynes, gave tone and impulse to the modes of its society. It were to mankind, if fairly done, worth any ten volumes of Quarterly Review essays.

Mr Lockhart does, it appears, directly claim great merit to Sir Walter Scott for stipulating, that John Ballantyne, and after his death, James, should have a third share along with Constable or Blackwood (or whoever was publisher) of the Waverley Novels. This was some sort of requital of their services, whether of John's negotiations, or of James as critic and corrector; and, moreover, one which, instead of costing Sir Walter anything, actually put money in his purse. He could not himself take a share in those bookselling speculations; so he stipulated for the third to his original publishers, the Ballantynes, on their paying their share of copy-money, expense of paper and print, &c.; while, by a secret stipulation, he, running no risk, received back one-half of whatever clear profit they made! We find Scott at one time telling James that he must have this sixth—while the whole was believed to go to James—as a fund to enable him to educate and equip a nephew for India. This secret bargaining gave Scott, besides, a hold over the publishers; as, by knowing their exact profits, he must have been the better enabled to bargain well for a new novel. It might have been, too, of pecuniary advantage to him in another way. If the Ballantynes, who knew the ground, were willing to venture their L.1000 or L.1500 for the third share of a novel, Constable or Longman would be not the less ready to come down with double that sum. But, if Sir Walter Scott, from giving on equal terms the sixths of his works sold to the publishers, was the generous benefactor of his friends the Ballantynes, then it follows, that he was the quadruple benefactor of Constable, Blackwood, Murray, or whoever it might be, to whom he sold the other two thirds.

We have carried this article farther than some of our distant readers may be able to go along with us, and have yet failed in our main object. Instead of dwelling on and exhibiting the duplex movement of the mind and life of Scott, we have buckled to Mr Lockhart's scurrilous and disingenuous statements:—but a time may come for the mightier interest. We shall therefore conclude with a few brief quotations. Ballantyne, who must often have been uneasy at the tremendous liabilities in which—starting at once with L.36,000—he was engaged with, or for, his patron-partner—(we advise every prudent man to eschew patron-partners)—we find expressing himself in these terms:—

When I reflect how many bills I have paid for Sir Walter Scott on verbal orders, or mere notes, which I thought no more about, I absolutely quake for the aspect under which I might be considered, were he to die. Thousands upon thousands might be brought against me; and all I could say would be, "Well, gentlemen, where are they? My manner of life is well-known—I have not spent them; my cash accounts are open—they are not there." Of late I have been more careful; but even yet I am sure there are some of his transactions which I am called upon ultimately to pay, which have never appeared in my books, and which, if rigidly scrutinized, would make an ignorant accountant like me stand upon character alone. Many is the hour's vexation and alarm this gives me.

Our next quotation is from the pamphlet of the Ballantyne Trustees:—

Now, we pray our readers to observe that, at the end of this period, and when the new copartnery was entered into in 1822, it was ascertained, that James Ballantyne and Co. were liable, for bills accepted or indorsed BY THAT FIRM, AND THEN CURRENT, TO THE AMOUNT OF THIRTY-SIX THOUSAND POUNDS. Who was liable for this enormous sum?

Why, Sir Walter Scott. Mr Lockhart can hardly dispute this; Ballantyne being only liable for his debts to Scott, his share of the stock, and his overdrawings beyond the amount of his share of profits—if that had been anything. For a prudent tradesman, even at the head of a most profitable business, it was much that he drew in those wild years; but it was still his own money.

So far was Scott from retracting the opinion, expressed to Lockhart, that "Ballantyne had owed his difficulties to him," that, when James Ballantyne, years afterwards, wishing a personal discharge from the creditors of the company, asked Scott's consent, which was necessary from their being jointly bound, Scott answered by letter—"So far as I am concerned, I give my consent with great pleasure to your discharge; being satisfied that, in all your transactions with me, you have acted with the utmost candour and integrity." Is not this enough of itself to shut Mr Lockhart's mouth, unless indeed, after perusing his Life of Scott, and these pamphlets, the reader is content to hold Sir Walter Scott for the ninny and simpleton, with his head in the clouds, and a set of Picaroons for twenty years picking his pockets, which, by a strange belief in his own powers of mystification, Mr Lockhart has chosen to represent his father-in-law, in that brilliant after-thought, "The Ballantyne Humbug Handled?" That pamphlet is intended as an apology for many things unwittingly let out; and were the representatives of other men whose memories have been assailed equally pertinacious and able, many more such would be required. Mr Lockhart's own mouth is ever the most fatal to him.

Mr Cadell, the publisher of the Life, cuts but a sorry figure in the last pamphlet. His statements to Mr Hughes, one of Mr Ballantyne's Trustees, are completely at issue with those of Mr Lockhart. Which of them may be in the right, where explanation can only shew one grossly unfair and the other shabby, is, so far as the Trustees are concerned, of no moment. The most amusing part of the business is the total oblivion of Mr Lockhart as to who this presumptuous Mr Hughes may be. It is quite true

"That new-made honour doth forget men's names;

And if they call him Jack I'll call him Peter."

But Mr Lockhart is completely oblivious of one Mr John Hughes; which is the more singular, as, while he was connected with Blackwood's

Magazine, printed in Ballantyne's office, Mr Hughes must have been rather prominent in the house of which he is now partner. Here too were Lockhart's own novels printed; but, more than all, after his marriage with Miss Scott, here, as he records, he was in the habit of repairing daily with Sir Walter; and yet he never saw—never heard of—knows nothing of this Testamentary Trustee of James Ballantyne. It is, however, of more importance that he should be able to refute Mr Hughes' statements than to remember his person. When reading Lockhart's "Life of Scott" in sheets in the printing-office, Mr Hughes, who had been for many years there—though he had eaten the fern-seed, and, (though no mote,) walked invisible to Mr Lockhart—was naturally struck with the gross mistatements respecting Mr James Ballantyne, his deceased friend and former employer, who had appointed him one of his Testamentary Trustees. While the Life was going through the press, he accordingly felt called upon, in justice and duty, to remonstrate; and enclosing a letter to Mr Cadell, to be forwarded to Mr Lockhart, to set him to rights, he observes:—"It is really too bad that James Ballantyne should be made a scape-goat for the transactions by which he was ruined."

Mr Cadell's account of this affair does not, according to the pamphlet, tally with Lockhart's; and there is little matter, as we have said, which is in the right, in the lesser matter, where both are wrong in the principal point—the injustice done Ballantyne. Mr Lockhart states, that Cadell told him he considered the conduct of Hughes "presumptuous, in venturing to interfere with a work going through the press;" no matter, we suppose, whatever false statements or calumnies it contained against a deceased friend, to whose children he stood in the relation of trustee. We shall ever rejoice to meet with such instances of presumption; and this is not the last of it. According to the gossip circulating in the "Nether Whig circles" of Edinburgh, when the new edition of Lockhart's "Life of Scott" was to be put to press, as the conduct of Mr Hughes and the other Trustees, had put Ballantyne's Office out of the question, another printer was applied to, or was to be favoured with the good and desirable job, who had the claim of being Mr Cadell's brother-in-law, but who, strange to say, refused it! And why? Though the publisher of the Life, Mr Cadell ventured upon no "presumptuous interference" with the Biographer or the Biography, even where it held up his father-in-law, Constable, to ridicule, and something worse; the printer, it is understood, took a less prudent, or a less tradesman-like view, and refused to be concerned in giving to the world a work which he and his family felt to be calumnious and insulting to the memory of their father—Mr Constable. The public, or we are greatly mistaken, will warmly sympathize in this piece of presumption, though of the kind which Mr Cadell, according to Lockhart's statement, must think wrong "upon principle," and every way foolish and impertinent.

Ballantyne's Trustees, in their reply to Mr Lockhart's pamphlet—the title of which prepared the reader for its coarseness—state that it does not contain a tithe of the scurrility which it possessed when it dropped from the pen of the editor of The Quarterly Review. It was purged and purified "by the good-humoured Counsel who revised the proof-sheets." As it still stands, this seems barely possible.

That we have not wasted the time of our readers about the vindication of a wholly obscure and insignificant, if not worthless person, we shall bring one more proof under Mr Lockhart's hand, contained in a letter addressed by him to Mr James Ballantyne, after a close acquaintance of more than a dozen years. Ballantyne had, it appears, been writing to Lockhart, complaining of Sir Walter's coldness and estrangement, before Sir Walter's death. Lockhart did not reply all at once: but when it suited him, for an ulterior purpose, he did; and, considering the way in which he subsequently held up James Ballantyne in the Memoir, and the "Humbly Handled," in a somewhat singular manner.

"London, Nov. 1, 1832.

"MY DEAR SIR,

"If any feeling had really existed of the nature which your letter begins with mentioning, that most touching, most manly letter would have been a thousand times more than enough to do away with it for ever. I can, however, speak for myself, that though I did observe a certain difference in your relations with your dear friend Sir Walter, I never even for one moment dreamed that anything had occurred to disturb the old genial feelings which had through your lives been equally marked in both of you as friends. For two years before his death, Sir Walter Scott was no longer, in all respects, the man of his earlier days; and I can perfectly understand, that his political impressions should have been conveyed with in that period in a style which would not before have been possible for him. Let us draw a veil over the infirmities of those few sad and weary months, and now endeavour to think of him only as he was when you and I so often shared together the delights of his friendship and conversation.

"Your Memoranda of him will be expected by me as among the most precious materials for his biography. You knew the man from a boy; and his literary life may be said to have been all in your presence, even from the working of its smallest springs. I earnestly hope your health may soon be entirely re-established; and I am joined in this wish by all the members of my wife's family, (they are all at this moment here,) as well as in the expression of sincere regret that you should have had the pain of writing such a letter at such a time.

"Believe me truly and cordially yours, (Signed) "J. G. LOCKHART.

"James Ballantyne, Esq. Printer, Edinburgh."

Mr Lockhart having received the Memoranda alluded to, again writes to Mr Ballantyne in the same "cordial" and affectionate manner:—

"London, December 6, 1832.

"MY DEAR SIR,

"I have received your packet, and read with much nite interest its precious contents. Your outline of your intercourse with Sir W. Scott is quite sufficient to keep me right as to some, most indeed, of the literary epochs of his life. The anecdotes interwoven and appended are even more valuable. Perhaps what you say as to his early-felt superiority over all that came into contact with his judgment, temper, and intellectual resources generally, will be to posterity a most satisfactory piece of evidence, how true that in him the boy was father to the man. I feel as if I had known him in the days of Kelso and the Tavern-club, and the Stage-coach Journey.

"I pray you to continue to draw on your memory for more and more of these invaluable details; and may your health, for this and a thousand other good works to follow, be strengthened and restored.

"Ever yours, most sincerely,

(Signed)

"J. G. LOCKHART.

"To James Ballantyne, Esq. Printer, Edinburgh."

"Truly and cordially yours!" Are we to take as evidence of his "cordiality" the manner in which Mr Lockhart has, throughout the whole of his work, treated the memory of the man whom he thus addresses—endeavouring to stigmatize his habits, ridicule his person, and blacken his character, by holding him up to the world as a mere fanfaron, overblown with vanity, pomposity, and gluttony—negligent, conceited, and full of vain imaginations?"

So much for Sir Walter Scott's biographer, who has, however, in the Life which he has given to the world, behaved equally ill to other departed men, the literary friends of Scott, and the honour of Scotland. As against Lockhart, the Trustees' defence of James Ballantyne is complete and triumphant.—May every honest man whose memory is so assailed and blackened, find such another staunch band, led on by a doughty Douglas, to defend his grave from the literary Vampires!

RECOLLECTIONS OF MINA, THE SPANISH PATRIOT.

BY MRS BROUGHTON.

It was in 1816 that my brother first introduced Mina to us. He was not, however, received as a stranger. That dear brother had made us so well acquainted with all his friend's good qualities, his frank-heartedness, and his partial attachment to himself, that we were all led to feel as much regard for the man, as to share the world's admiration of the devoted patriot. Nor did he sink in our esteem when he became personally known;—for he, too, would speak, in terms of no ordinary praise, of him who was his father's pride—and well might we all be proud of him. Mina was so, in calling him his Caro Amigo, and in telling us, with as much delight as we listened, of my brother's gallant deeds, his hairbreadth escapes, his perseverance in making his way even into the enemy's camp, when a more distant survey was unsatisfactory; "And then," added Mina, "not a Spaniard could excel Don Enrique in a fandango or bolero:—the peasants would have died for him."

Many were the proofs they gave that such were indeed their feelings towards my brother. He was once, for eleven days, hid by some of them between the tiles and rafters of a house, which was suddenly invested and occupied by a party of French, who had the most positive orders to discover that "Diable d'Officier Anglais," as General Foy told General Alava (who, the next day, repeated it to my father) he called that young officer attached to the Guerillas:—"For when I had ordered every research to be made, and no means left untried, to make him prisoner, I would hear of him in quite another quarter; and even once I found a pound of tea upon the table of my own tent, addressed to me, with Captain B.'s compliments, as he heard I was partial to tea and had none. This really was the case," continued General Foy, "but how he got it there I never could discover; and I did all I could, for that young man did more to counteract us in that part of Spain than any other individual of the British army. C'est un brave garçon, and I would be delighted to shake him by the hand and tell him so, and thank him now for his tea, though he enraged me enough at the time." My brother was at Cambray at this time, and therefore could not avail himself of the desire he participated with the gallant general, of making up their ancient feuds. But, to return to my recollections of Mina; they are such as cannot, in any sense, be reconciled to his reputation for cruelty. That that good-natured, simple-hearted man—whose ready laugh ever answered and rivalled in its joyfully infectious sound that of the wild girl of fifteen—could be cruel, is incomprehensible. I thought Mina was the best-natured man I ever knew—How then could he be cruel? Once indeed, he did shock me; he was to accompany us to a ball; and when he arrived he found my father, who was waiting the conclusion of my mother's toilette, in the drawing-room, while I was seated, like Cinderella in the chimney-corner, wrapped up in caps and shawls, watching the cup of tisane to which I was condemned, as a remedy for a violent attack of cold and cough: he, with his usual good nature, sympathized with me on my disappointment at missing the evening's anticipated pleasures; and, as usual with all but the stiffsons of Britain, inquired, what were, in addition to the never-failing tisane, the remedies I was submitting to. On my replying that the doctor threatened me with a blister—

"Do not put on any such thing," said he—"but, instead of it, get a plaster of dead-man's fat, and it will cure you directly."

My dear father found the words I could not, to express our united impolite horror at such a prescription.

"Why," said Mina, "it is the commonest thing in the world in Spain; when I had the wound in my thigh, I had such a salve applied for weeks to it, and it cured me."

"Thanks to the French, General, who made it so abundant," added my father.

I was very glad that my mother's entrance changed the revolting subject; and that shaking hands was not a Spanish custom.

In the summer of 1817 and 1818, we had a charming country-house beyond the Bois de Boulogne, and immediately opposite stood the palace and park of St Cloud, from which our grounds were only separated by the Seine. From my mother's room, on the first floor, we had, as we sat in it, a full view of the waterworks, and, (during the three weeks that the fête lasts,) of the animated scene presented by the numerous votaries of amusement—the old, the young, demure and gay—whether imperial, legitimate, or constitutional in their sentiments—never failing to perform their annual pilgrimage to this famed residence of many masters; for the fête under every dynasty has at least retained its renommée, and has attractions for every grade of society; from those who will babble of le pittoresque et le romantique, by the side of its mathematically-formed fountains, its equally square tapis de verdure, or beneath the shade of the no less precisely clipped rows of elms; to the more actively happy adept at the jeu de bagues, twirled round upon his wooden charger. Vain, however, would be the attempt to retrace mes souvenirs of all the means by which on s'est bien amusé à la fête de St Cloud. During our daily visit to the gay scene, what was ever my chief delight, I was never disappointed in meeting there the sight of many happy faces. My own, I think, could not have been the saddest amongst them; for my views of that life which I was just entering, were even yet more brightly tinted than all the varied scene around me. But, much as we then used to look forward to this interruption of our usual routine of life, we were reconciled when we were left to the calmer enjoyment of the many lovely walks in the more naturally laid out parts of the park; for we had scarcely any grounds attached to our own house, besides the very beautiful and extensive garden, which was kept in the finest order by the proprietor, a wealthy man, who did not spare any expense upon it. I remember Lord Northesk telling me afterwards, in London, that he had not seen so pretty a place in France. Prince Metternich had formerly lived in it; and it was subsequently hired, by the order of Napoleon, for the celebrated Polish princess, who presented a splendid pair of silver candelabra to the village church; where they still remain to remind the villagers of her of whose active benevolence we heard many instances. So often do I live over the days passed in that house, when—with one, who, however far exalted above me—I could, in my more humble lot, with equal truth express myself as Unthinking, idle, wild, and young,

I laughed, and danced, and talked, and sung;

And, proud of health—of freedom vain—

Dream't not of sorrow, care, nor pain—

NO. LXX.—VOL. VI.

Concluding, in those hours of glee,
That all the world was made for me,

—that I have not been able to forbear to radoter of those hours, couleur de rose, when my first intention was merely to say, that, while we lived there, Mina was, with many other less celebrated remembered ones, a frequent visitor at our house. As my dear mother prided herself very much on the successful result of her instructions to a French cook in the composition of an Ouâ Podrida, it never failed making its appearance, and eliciting the unqualified praise of Mina, whenever he dined with us. He was, at that time, always accompanied by two of his former followers, besides his faithful secretary, who remained with him all the time he was in exile. General Mina's address certainly derived no small advantage and polish from his long, however unwillingly protracted, residence in the capital of civilized Europe. However, he always exhibited real politeness; for he ever wished to please those in whose society he was. But, poor man, at this time, he could only, by the display of his splendid set of teeth, evince his own sense of the pains to be agreeable taken by others, unless they were able to understand him in his native language, as he could not utter a word in any other. It was, therefore, an additional inducement to him frequently to avail himself of my father's constant welcome, that, from our early residence in Spain, he could, in our house, dispense with a dragoman; which office, at that time, even his secretary was not very well able to fulfil: he afterwards, however, spoke and wrote French perfectly. The General, although slower in his progress, astonished us with his proficiency on our return to Paris, after an absence of twelve months in the low countries; for, on our departure, he scarcely attempted taking any part in a French conversation, besides repeating "Peutaiquai, Peutaiquai;" by which, we all concluded, he meant "Peut-etre." He probably considered that, by using so undecided a reply, he could not compromise himself; but this habit was often the cause of our meriting a bitter reproof from my mother, for our inexplicable mirth. On our return from Spa, we sincerely congratulated him on the great additions to his vocabulary, and ourselves in not being so often tempted. We also rejoiced at the apparent improvement in his outward circumstances; for, when we were first acquainted with him, my dear father often feared that he must have been géné in pecuniary matters, from the humble lodgings in which he resided; and also, when he lived at Versailles, for some months, by his invariably walking the whole way to and from Paris; this, he said, he did from choice, and requiring a good deal of exercise; but my father often feared it might be otherwise. He was now much more suitably lodged in the Rue d'Artois. I forget whether it was before or after our absence, that he one day called, and, with some degree of agitation, asked my father if he had heard that he had been arrested; and proceeded to tell him that, a day or two before, the Spanish ambassador had taken upon himself to cause him to be arrested, with the intention of sending him a prisoner to Spain. The police, however, interfered and released him; and so properly and seriously were Louis XVIII. and his Ministers displeased at so unheard-of a proceeding on the part of the Spanish ambassador, that they insisted upon, and obtained his immediate recall, by the Court of Madrid, who were obliged to disown the orders they had given him. Mina, from that time, was left, to all appearance, unpersecuted in his unjust exile from the country, and by the ungrateful sovereign who owed so much to one who had sold all his patrimony, and devoted his existence to achieve the liberation of the first from its invaders, and of the latter from that ignominious thralldom to which they had reduced him. My mother, one day, expressed to him the hope that, should Ferdinand be dead, (as was at that time reported,) she should see him return to the land of his fathers. His answer was, that he should be very sorry if the report were true; for, unjustly as the King had acted towards him, he was a better man than many thought him: in short, said he, he is an angel to his brothers; of whom he then spoke in a manner that fully satisfied me that it will not be the fault of Espos y Mina, should Don Carlos usurp the throne of Isabella II. And in this comparatively favourable estimation of Ferdinand, Mina was not singular, as I heard the same sentiments from almost every Spanish patriot I ever knew; and I was acquainted with many of them, both at the commencement of the persecution of the Constitutionalists, and afterwards in 1830, at the period of their unfortunate attempt to enter Spain. Sad, indeed, was the state of destitution in which they left their wives and children in Paris, on their setting out to join their brothers in arms on the frontier; they themselves, indeed, bearing, in their almost tattered garb, the uniform of misery—often the patriot's only distinction. Now, I trust that many of those who were the objects of my sincere commiseration and esteem, are restored to their paternal hearths. That they may remain in their tranquil enjoyment, is my heart felt wish, and that the day-star of truth, divine and moral, may brightly shine on that lovely land of the orange and the vine.

But to return:—The newly-appointed Spanish ambassador being obliged to leave Mina publicly unmolested, adopted another course; by which he hoped to fulfil his secret instructions, and ensnare the object of his master's fears, more successfully than his predecessor had done. This he hoped to accomplish by prevailing on a beautiful Spanish lady, whom he believed to be entirely devoted to his interests, to take an apartment in the same house with Mina, and to exert the influence of her charms to obtain his entire confidence, and then to betray all that she could learn of his plans, associates, &c., &c. However determined the fair siren may have been in her devoted loyalty and obedience to the service of Ferdinand, she soon became too sensible of Mina's good qualities to withstand the arguments he adduced to prove the justice of his cause; and not many months elapsed ere the reports of the fair Castilian were as false to the ambassador as she was true to the suffering patriot's cause:—consequently, their movements were unimpeded, as the Spanish Government was convinced that the cause was indeed desperate, since he who was the very soul of it had so completely abandoned all hope of its possible success, and had sunk down into the lap of indolence.

About this time, all our acquaintances were conspiring how they could most effectually surprise and astonish each other by the elegance or eccentricity of the toilette they should adopt at a bal costumé, for which our most agreeable friend, Mrs N—, (the Viscountess of the undaunted Viscount C— St V—,) had issued cards of invitation, and to which we were all looking forward with a more than ordinary interest, from the conviction that such an entertainment, under the direction of the amiable and animated inviter, would realize all the pleasure we promised ourselves:—Therefore, in our own particular coterie, "what we should wear" became a constant theme of conversation, and the occasion of asking the counsel of our friends. Mina, who was present at one of these discussions, advised my mother to wear a Spanish costume; and, as she said that she no longer had a complete dress, he offered to procure her a very handsome one, belonging to a lady who resided in the same house with himself. My mother politely declined his offer; and this was the only occasion in which he mentioned his fair neighbour, although my father often met her when visiting him. Not long after, my father received a message from General Mina, requesting to see him, as he was very dangerously ill from the consequences of a severe fall he had met with: his foot having slipped, he had been precipitated down a whole flight of stairs, and his back had received so much injury, that he was confined to his bed. My father went to him immediately, and, on his return, told us that he was certainly looking very ill—that he was suffering so much pain as not to allow him even to shave himself, and that he had quite a ghastly appearance. While my father sat with him, a Spanish ecclesiastic was announced; and, at the same instant, ere he entered the room, Mina whispered to my father, "a spy;" the next moment the padre appeared, and my father took his leave. Two mornings after this, we were all actually startled by General Mina making his appearance in our drawing-room, leaning on a thick cane, and stooping in his gait.

"How is this, my friend," exclaimed my father; "is this you or your ghost?"

"My real self," said he, laughing. "I was tired to death; I could no longer bear to be prisoner in bed; and I already feel better for the air."

He then immediately turned the conversation; but, when he rose to take leave, we were all much astonished at the change in his manners;

he appeared quite agitated, his voice faltered, and as, according to Spanish usage, he always embraced my father, he did so repeatedly, and we all thought we saw his eyes fill with tears; and he then requested us to allow him to shake hands with us, which he had never done before.

"How extraordinary that General Mina's spirits should suffer so much by his indisposition," was ejaculated by each of the family, as he left the room; "who could have believed it?" But the next day our wonder was increased, by seeing him pass the carriage in which my sister and I were seated—waiting for my mother, who was paying a visit—with as firm a step and as erect a carriage as we had ever beheld. He saw us; and, instead of crossing to the side of the street we were on, merely smiled and kissed his hand. Our surmises were, however, soon decided; for the following day it was publicly reported that Mina had escaped the surveillance of both Spanish espionage and French police; and was by that time, thanks to the effectual aid and well-calculated arrangements of his excellent friend, Major H——, far on his way to join his anxiously expecting partisans. From Major H. we afterwards learned the particulars of his evasion. Accompanied by his faithfully-attached secretary, he walked to a considerable distance from Paris, when they were met by Major H——, who then drove them himself in his calèche, until they could with safety venture to take post-horses, availing themselves of Major H——'s passport to procure them. My dear father continued to receive the most friendly letters from Mina for several months after his quitting France—the last was one of heartfelt condolence on the premature death of his beloved friend, my ever-lamented brother; cut off in the prime of manhood, in the midst of his honourable career, by liver complaint, only a few months after his arrival in India. He had proceeded thither in a dragoon regiment, into which his ardent desire to continue that active life, which he had unceasingly pursued from his early entrance into the service of his sovereign, induced him to enter, and to prevail upon our father to enable him to exchange, by the advance of the requisite sum of money. He could not endure the thought of slothful ease, and a brevet majority. After having, when but a boy, commenced his military career, as a volunteer with the troops that went from Malta to Calabria, on his return from that expedition, being appointed to a regiment ever distinguished in our glorious annals,* he joined it just before the attack upon Copenhagen; after which he was at the taking of Martinique; and, with his own hand, first planted the British standard upon its conquered walls. When his regiment was ordered from America to Spain, he hesitated not to relinquish his excellent appointment on the staff of an old friend of his father's, nor even to part from a young bride, that he might not be behind hand in reaping the laurels and dangers of his regimental comrades. In the new field of action, where his perfect knowledge of Spain, its language and usages, and his consequent popularity with all classes of its inhabitants, caused him to be charged with the dangerous employment of reconnoitring, and subsequently to be attached, by his illustrious commander, to the staff of the Guerillas, he had more than common risks to encounter:—but the approbation he then and ever after constantly merited from all his superiors, and the love, I believe I may add the enthusiastic admiration, his delightful manners and excellent qualities obtained from his brother officers, have been no small sources of proud recollection and consolation to those who knew and fondly loved him. That that dear son—whom he left an orphan ere he could appreciate the irreparable loss he sustained, and who so lately, following his and his forefathers' example, has become a soldier too—may emulate his honoured course, and find, in those who were his father's comrades, guides, mentors, and friends, is the earnest wish of a fondly-anxious relative.

My father fully appreciated the motives of his esteemed friend, in ceasing to write to him; for even to be suspected of a correspondence with "ce brigand Mina" would not only have compromised my father with the French authorities, but, I have no doubt, we should have been put beyond the pale of all la bonne société, as the Faubourg St Germain and its adherents exclusively consider themselves. We, therefore, reconciled ourselves to the necessity of only hearing of my brother's friend through the medium of the English newspapers. All the French accounts of the Spanish revolution, or its favourers, we never allowed ourselves to credit, or we should often have prematurely mourned the fate of those for whom we felt sincerely interested. Unless any one has really lived in France, it would scarcely be credited, especially by the in-all-circumstances inanimately quiet well-bred people of Albion, how passionately the very highest bred and born sons and daughters of "ce plaisant pays de France" are affected when their feelings or opinions, especially political, are interested. They are never lukewarm in their aversions, nor indifferent when they profess friendship. How falsely are they judged by the ever-calculating weighers of propriety, who flatter themselves that, in avoiding, in the common intercourse of social life, to make professions of regard, they may, indulging their icy selfishness, accuse the French of insincerity:—How falsely, I am sure, will be testified by those who, like myself, have lived intimately amongst them, and who have the happiness to possess many constantly kind, and, the time has been, tried and sympathizing friends! I feel convinced that I am not partial in my estimation of the French character, for I am perfectly free from national prejudices. I have, from infancy, been so truly cosmopolite, that I see the lights and shadows of the two rival nations with an equal judgment; and although, in France, I have been as often accused as I am in this country of partiality, I have an equal interest in observing and comparing the respective merits and foibles of my two patries. Among those of the French, nothing has offered me more amusement than their blind violence in all that regards their political passions, for sentiments would be too calm a term to apply; and I am even more insidiously affected by all party spirit than as to what nation I might claim as mine, congratulating myself malgré cela that the imprecations of the great Seer of the North read not—“Breathes there a maid with soul so dead,” &c.

* Royal Welsh Fusiliers.

Not that if they did, I should always have been equally condemnable:—For once upon a time I gave proof of possessing a very different spirit. It was a long time ago—(I need not say how long, for I was but five years old)—that I gave vent to a burst of patriotism, which, even to remember for some years afterwards, overwhelmed me with confusion—for I prided myself in those days in being a very polite, well-bred, young lady. I was often indulged in spending the day with a very partial friend, a niece of General Washington's, whose husband was American Consul-General at —, where, until my dear father broke through it, there was established the illiberal custom, that the representatives of the different powers who happened to be at war with each other, should absurdly abstain from any private intercourse. So that, however intimate they or their families had previously been, (and the little Oasis of European society in that land of barbarians, necessarily waived all heartless ceremony,) suddenly, on any political rupture between their distant courts, they became as strangers to each other. This was the state of etiquette on our arrival at —; and, consequently, my parents were not visited by the French Consul-General, M. de T., and his lady—the latter a near relation of the Buonaparte family. I had, therefore, never seen M. de T., until one day that I was amusing myself in my indulgent friend, Mrs L.'s, saloon—giving way to my uncontrolled and exuberant flow of spirits, singing and dancing up and down the room, unchecked even by the entrance of a stranger, who, as my canzonnetta was in Italian, addressed me in that language; his compliments, however, were scarcely acknowledged by a smile of affability, so intent was I in viewing my improvvisati attitudes as I passed and repassed the splendid mirror which filled a space between two Ottomans. On Mrs L.'s appearing, he inquired who that very lively young lady was; and, on hearing her reply, he said:—

“Oh, that is impossible; for all the English are so very melancholy and serious—I am sure she is an Italian.”

I still danced on, merely shaking my head at his guessing wrong.

“Not an Italian? well, then, I'll guess again: she is a Spaniard.”

Another shake of denial.

“Well, then, she is a German.”

And he went on guessing, nation after nation; at last he said:—

“I am sure I must at least be right now; she is a French girl.”

This was more than I had patience to endure; and, clasping my hands in each other, I exclaimed:—

“Grazie a Iddio che non sono Francese!” and the next moment I was caught up in M. de T.'s arms, who, delighted beyond measure, cried—

“Charming, charming, there's Nature—my little honest patriot!”

From that hour he never named me but “his little Grazie a Iddio,” to my often renewed regret and shame; for he afterwards became my father's much valued and regarded friend, to whom he afforded much amusement, when he, claiming me as his first acquaintance, related the circumstances of our first meeting. As is usual with all enthusiasts, I have passed from one extreme to the other, and, consequently, was often assailed, especially since la dernière Revolution, upon my incomprehensible apathy. I have even, by those who loved me well, been told that I might as well be a liberal at once as not to have any opinion prononcé. I have, however, continued to cherish my indifference, and have calmly enjoyed the many amusing scenes of enthusiasm—often seeing all around me excited to the most exaggerated degree on some greedily received and equally improbable intelligence being announced. Never was this more evinced, than at the time of the Duc d'Angoulême's conducting the French army of Observation to take a closer view of Spain than his Royal Highness's near sight would permit him on this side of the Pyrenees,—and as there was not a family, with which we were acquainted, who had not a father, son, or brother under his command, every other subject of conversation was banished, and we heard our poor Spanish friends stigmatized with many an opprobrious title. Trying as this was to us, we really pitied some ladies of our acquaintance, who were more deeply interested in the fate of Spain. Mrs W. and her daughter, although of Irish extraction, were natives of Cadiz—a city ever devoted to constitutional principles; and in these opinions they, in common with all their kindred, warmly participated. Mrs W. had been induced to visit France for the purpose of placing her daughter in the convent of Dames Anglaises, where she was seduced, and had not long left it, after adding to her Spanish sprightliness toutes les grâces of a finished Parisian education. She was, therefore, much admired, and their acquaintance readily sought by la meilleure société; and, until this projected invasion of Spain, they had continued on terms of the greatest intimacy and cordiality with several of the first families in the town of —, where we also were at the time residing. Mrs W. was, of course, often painfully distressed at all the abuse she heard of those friends for whose success and welfare she was feeling the utmost anxiety; but she avoided, as much as possible, expressing her obnoxious opinions until, one day, that two young and intimate companions of her daughter—the daughters of Admiral de P.—called upon them and exultingly announced that the Duc d'Angouleme had decidedly crossed the frontier, and had entered Spain. All Mrs W.'s prudent admonitions to her daughter, to evade political discussions, failed to deter the warm-hearted, patriotic girl from exclaiming—

“ Well, then, I can only say, that I hope the first cannon that the Spaniards fire, will kill the Duc d'Angouleme.”

Horrified, indeed, were the Demoiselles de P. to hear this almost sacrilegious ejaculation, and they instantly and abruptly left the house, declaring they never could enter it again. Nor did their indignation rest here. Before the following evening there was not a single French acquaintance of Mrs W.'s who had not closed their doors upon her; nor would they even consent to meet her poor thoughtless daughter at the house of any mutual English acquaintance;—of this we were ourselves very painfully convinced. My mother having shortly after issued cards of invitation for an evening party, was waited upon by several persons, who assured her, that however much they should be disappointed by not accepting her invitation, they must decline that honour, if Mrs and Miss W. were to be of the number of her guests, as they could not possibly associate with persons qui pensaient si mal. My mother was therefore left to the painful alternative of apparently slighting these ladies, or of having empty rooms; she therefore determined on dividing her party into two soirées—an English and a French one. Mrs W., however, was not, I believe, satisfied with this arrangement; for from that time she was evidently less cordial in her manner to us than she had been, although my mother was almost the only person who could and did venture so far to brave the influential opinion of the arbiters of who were admissible dans la bonne société. Mrs W., however, proudly reconciled herself to the loss of the friendship of these ultra professors of principles of the extreme right; while her open-hearted daughter occupied the hours she had hitherto passed in the society of her quondam friends and admirers, in embroidering a splendid white lace surplice for her favourite brother, an ecclesiastic, distinguished at the Papal Court for his superior piety and learning.

Some months afterwards, Admiral de P. and his family accidentally placed themselves at church immediately behind Mrs W. and her daughter; the latter, as soon as mass was concluded, turned towards Mesdemoiselles de P. and said, she availed herself of the opportunity to assure them that she unfeignedly forgave all the injury they had done her, and, curtseying, passed on. As many persons witnessed the unaffected manner with which she evinced her obedience to that principle, which, above all others, distinguishes those (of whatever outward denomination they may be) who truly desire to walk according to the example and precepts of Him whose holy name they profess to bear, she was unanimously applauded, even by those who, however, still continued to consider it necessary to prove their devoted loyalty and ultraism, by persecuting a thoughtless girl of eighteen for an unguarded expression.*

MY INTERMENT.

(From the French of Béranger.)

“ Ce matin je ne sais comment,” &c.

THIS morning, how I cannot say,
A troop of Loves was in my room;
And, as in bed I stirless lay,
“ He's dead,” they cried, in accents gay;
“ Come, let us bear him to the tomb.”
Inly I cursed the merry crew
Who had so oft my homage won,
My friends, if what they say be true,*
Give me your tears—I'm dead and gone!

They drank my wine; not that alone;
They pulled about my chamber-maid;
One wished to guide my bier—and one,
With a grave air and nasal tone,
A prayer for the departed prayed.
They ranged a score of imps with lutes,
To be my escort, round about;—
But, lo! the hearse, and mimic mutes!—
Give me your tears—I'm carried out!

Two lines of Loves, with joyous haste,
Through laughing round; while on the pall
With silver spangles duly graced,
A cup, a lute, and flowers were placed—
Signs of my joyous orders all,

The passengers, uncovered, say—
“ The grave and gay must meet their doom;”
The bearers hurry on their way—
Give me your tears—I'm at the tomb!

My funeral friends, instead of prayer,
Chanted around my brightest numbers;
Thanks to the sculptor's friendly care,
A laurel crown is rounded fair
To warm, with pride, my mortal alumbers.
All speaks my glory round this spot,
Where none shall soon be seen nor heard;
Am I a demigod or not?—
Give me your tears—I am interred!

But then, by chance, while thus I lay,
Lisette, the faithless, wandered nigh;
She snatched me from the tomb away;
And then, but why I cannot say,
I felt revived while she was by.
Oh, ye whom age incites to call
The sweets of life but cold and vain;
Eternal censurers of all—
Give me your tears—I live again!

THE ABBÉ GODARD.

AN EPISODE IN THE FRENCH REVOLUTION.

TOWARDS the close of the memorable month of August, 1792—fatal to the dynasty of the ancient kings of France—the Abbé Godard, grand-vicar of Bourges, under the old régime, was at Paris. He shared the opinions and misfortunes of the priests who had refused to take the oath to the civil constitution of the clergy, in consequence of which they were denounced and proscribed, by the band of ruffians who had seized on the government, as refractory, and rebels to the law. Their only offence consisted in claiming for themselves that exercise of the right of private judgment, which the new constitution professed to confer on every Frenchman; and they made use of this privilege to refuse the oath required.

Immediately after the terrible 10th of August, the provisional committee, at first composed only of the twenty-two sections of Paris, and convened at meetings in which no forms nor rules of justice or consistency were observed, usurped the whole authority of the capital; and, having deprived the ancient municipality of all their former prerogatives, commenced their plans for perpetrating the atrocious deeds which they shortly afterwards carried into execution. Such was their ferocity and hardihood, that Carrier, Marat, Robespierre, and their leading coadjutors, openly avowed their sanguinary intentions in the committee, at the Jacobin Club, and even in the hall of the National Convention.

One of the first and most effective modes of accomplishing their designs was the establishment of domiciliary and nocturnal visits, under the pretext of searching after military weapons for the use of the troops who were about to march to the frontier, and also to take them out of the hands of the malecontents; but the true object was, to rob and persecute all who had defended the king on the 10th of August; the ministers dismissed at that period, the priests who had refused the oath, and, generally, all whom the tyrants called false patriots and enemies of the revolution, to the success of which they declared that many more victims must be sacrificed. By an order of the provisional committee, the barriers of Paris were watched with a vigilance till then unknown; the villages and municipalities, at the greatest distance from the capital, were ordered to seize all who might attempt to escape; and this mandate was executed with the sternest rigour. Those who knew themselves to be marked objects of this persecution were obliged to confine themselves within their houses, or seek shelter with their friends; but, after a few nights, very few escaped the searching scrutiny of the police. When arrested, the prisoners were crowded into the Abbaye, the Conciergerie, La Force, Bicêtre, La Salpêtrière, and St Pelagie; and, when these gaols did not suffice for the incarceration of the victims, they shut up three hundred priests in the church of the Carmélites, the seminary of St Firmin, the Mairie, and other places selected for temporary detention.

The Abbé Godard arrived at Paris in the last week of August, 1792, and succeeded in entering within its walls, although he had been pursued with more than usual rigour, on account of his well-known intimacy with many of the nobility, bishops, and other ecclesiastics, who had remained in Paris. But he soon fell into the clutches of the Jacobins—being seized in the middle of the night in an unfurnished room, in a house that belonged to him, which he had let to an absent friend. He was taken before the commissioners of the section, and from thence to the Mairie, the former residence of the first President. When he appeared before one of the minor revolutionary tribunals, whose business it was to classify the prisoners in different gaols, he demanded to know how, under a government professedly established on the principles of liberty, a citizen could be arrested in his own private dwelling, without any previous notice, without trial, and without even being informed of the nature of his offence? The answer he received was this: "Are you not a priest?" He replied in the affirmative. "Well," said the interrogator, "we shall not forget your answer." Without any further ceremony he was conducted to a hay loft in the Mairie, which had been converted into a prison, and he found himself the sixtieth victim in his new abode. His companions in misfortune were several priests, some lawyers, Parisian tradesmen, and men of letters.

Here enters on the scene, a young man of noble and grateful character, who displayed a devotion, a zeal, and disinterestedness, which shew that, in the worst of times, virtue, probity, and honour will still animate the hearts and govern the conduct of the choice few. The Abbé Godard had rendered some services to a young man, named Dreux, whom he had assisted in his education, and for whom he had successfully solicited the place of clerk in the office of the municipality. After the arrival of the Abbé Godard at Paris, Dreux had exerted himself to conceal his hiding-place. He lodged with him during several days, and paid him the most assiduous and respectful attentions. As soon as the Abbé was arrested, his first endeavour was to make his situation known to Dreux, who, on his part, busied himself in forming plans to release his benefactor.

The intention of the Jacobins to massacre all their prisoners had been publicly made known for some weeks. They inflamed the passions of the multitude by complaining of the delays of justice, and ascribed the evil to a conspiracy of the aristocrats. At first they only mentioned the names of some notorious official plunderers, who really deserved some legal punishment, and of some well-known and intemperate friends of the old system; but they clearly forebore that, when the wild and infuriated populace were thrown upon the jails, they would not exercise the least discrimination, and that nobles, dismissed ministers, priests, aristocrats, as well as moderate and constitutional democrats, (which last class had recently become objects of the bitterest hatred to the Jacobins,) would all be included in one common slaughter. Under these awful circumstances, Dreux, who was small in stature and delicate in constitution, determined to hazard his life in an attempt to rescue the Abbé Godard from the fate that awaited him. This enterprise was peculiarly difficult, as the young man had but little leisure time, and his services would have been but of slight avail could he not have moved about the city as emergencies arose. He accordingly demanded a short leave of absence from his office, telling the chief functionary that he wished to attend on a friend who was in great misfortune; but he was told that the first duty of a clerk was to discharge the duties of his post, and all indulgence was peremptorily refused. "But suppose that I were seriously ill," said Dreux, "you surely would not take away my place, but find means to do without my attendance for a few days; I beg you to act now as if I were an invalid." The head of the department remained inflexible; on which Dreux said to him:—"Sir, you may give my situation to some other person, for I will not retain it at the sacrifice of gratitude and friendship." His master took him at his word, and the young man was thus thrown destitute on the wide world—a trait of moral heroism which all must admire, but which few would imitate.

After his dismissal, the first object of Dreux was to acquaint the personal friends of the Abbé Godard with his perilous situation. He particularly apprised Madame Asseline, sister to the Bishop of Boulogne; and all bestirred themselves actively to obtain his liberty from the men then in power, such as Petion, Fauchet, Manuel, and others, the chiefs of the Provisional Committee, who exercised an authority more despotic than ever had been pretended to by the old police of Paris, or rather a tyranny more imperious than that of a Tiberius or a Nero.

During this time the Abbé Godard and his companions suffered all the inconveniences of confinement; the greater number of them sleeping on straw, and living on the coarsest diet, as they had no means of obtaining better food. Some, who had been robbed when arrested, went without nourishment for three days, and the whole of them were barely kept up above the level of starvation. Among the prisoners was an individual named Charnois, a literary character, who had edited several periodical works, and among others the Moderateur, a paper regarded as revolutionary, because it kept within the bounds of decency, but for that very reason, criminal in the eyes of the Jacobins, who pretended to establish all sorts of liberty, though they would not acknowledge the freedom of the press, when it opposed their own sanguinary measures. Charnois was melancholy and broken in spirit. On the third day he entered into conversation with the Abbé Godard, and expressed his astonishment at the marked contrast between the placidity and resignation of the priests, and the fretfulness and despair of the other prisoners. The Abbé pointed out to him the consolations of religion, and the utter insufficiency of the wild dreams of the French philosophy to afford hope or comfort in adversity. This discourse produced a salutary effect, and, up to the last fatal moment, Charnois lived in comparative happiness.

Up to the night of the 1st of September, the prisoners were kept in ignorance of their ulterior destination. On that night, their gaolers commenced removing them to the Abbaye of Saint Germain. All those who were confined in the same chamber with the Abbé Godard were transferred, and, on the following day, thirty more victims who remained followed them. The circumstance of the removal of the prisoners from the Mairie to the Abbaye, on the evening of the day when the general massacre commenced, is remarkable, because it proves a fact scarcely credible even in those horrible days, that the same men who had issued out the arrests after the 10th of August had formed and matured a project to have all their prisoners slaughtered by an infuriated populace. It was agreed that these murders should commence on the following Sunday. It became, therefore, necessary to send their victims to the place of execution on the evening of Saturday. The last division left the Abbaye at two o'clock on Sunday, when the massacre had already commenced. The Marseillais who escorted them, knew this perfectly well; for, during the march, they pointed them out to the people as already devoted to death, and even told them of the fate that was impending; thus did they lead them knowingly to slaughter. As soon as they arrived at the Abbaye, these unfortunate beings were murdered as they stepped out of the coaches, and not one escaped, except the benevolent Abbé Sicard, the amiable instructor of the deaf and dumb. This friend and benefactor of the human race had crouched down on the bottom of the vehicle, out of which four of his companions had been dragged; he was not immediately seen by the murderers, and by the courage of a watchmaker, named Monot, who knew him, he was rescued.

The friends of the Abbé Godard did not slumber during this critical period; and though a report was generally circulated, after the middle of August, that the prisons would be forced, scarcely any one believed that measures would be carried to this dreadful extremity. Moreover, during the agitation that convulsed the capital, there was the greatest difficulty in approaching public men, and still more of obtaining justice; so much so, that Dreux and Madame Asseline were unable to effect anything, even up to the fatal Sunday morning. At this moment the situations of the prisoners became most awful.

Dreux, who had seen the Abbé Godard at the Mairie on Saturday, on returning on the Sunday morning, was alarmed at his removal. He ran immediately to the Abbaye, where he ascertained the exact apartment in which his friend was confined. From thence he flew to the residence of Madame Asseline, and depicted the danger of his benefactor in such forcible terms, that she instantly proceeded to Fauchet, whom she had already solicited to interpose, though without effect; but who, nevertheless, had manifested a disposition to assist the Abbé Godard, whom he had known in former times, when he was Grand Vicar of Bourges. As this lady was crossing the Pont-Neuf to renew her entreaties with this gentleman, the cannon sounded an alarm. The people were collecting in masses; she was terrified, and retraced her steps homewards, and this circumstance was fortunate for her friend, as she afterwards ascertained that she would not then have found the Abbé Fauchet; and, in all probability, this first disappointment would have thrown her into a state of despair, and prevented any further exertions on her part. After some pause and hesitation, she recovered her resolution, and set out again to obtain an interview with the Abbé Fauchet, at his house, in the Rue de Chabanais. She fortunately met him, and renewed her supplications, urging every persuasive argument that could work on his feelings. But Fauchet could not do anything of himself; at this critical moment, nothing but an order signed by Manuel, procureur-syndic of the committee, could extricate the Abbé Godard from prison; but where was Manuel to be found in this scene of tumult and disorder? There was not a moment to be lost. Extraordinary as it may appear, Fauchet, lifting up the blind of his window, saw Manuel, in the opposite house, seated at table with several women of loose character. Madame Asseline now vehemently pressed Fauchet to send for his friend; he did so; Manuel came, and, after much entreaty, he wrote the following note:—"Gaoler of the Abbaye, release the prisoner, Godard, who has not taken the oath; but who, not being a public functionary, is not bound to swear. The present order will be executed by one of the commissaries of the Section of Cordeliers. (Signed) P. MANUEL."

Madame Asseline thought, from the sneer on his countenance, when Manuel delivered the paper, that it would prove useless; either through some intentional informality in the wording of it, or from the delay that might occur in its delivery. Doubtful, however, as she was of success, she hastened to Dreux, who was waiting for her in an adjoining house, and who hurried off with the order to the section of Cordeliers, to obtain a commissary to execute it. The committee of the section were assembled; they raised every possible difficulty; various constructions, all unfavourable to the prisoner, were put upon the order; and they finally declared, that the Abbé Godard was suspected of incivisme, or disaffection to the country. But Dreux still insisted, and called upon them, most peremptorily, to affix their signature to the order of Manuel; which they at length did, but added a marginal note, that the Abbé had not given any bail for his citizenship, intending that this remark should prevent his liberation. After the young man had conquered all these difficulties, he was still unable to find a single commissary to proceed with him to the Abbaye, so fearful were these Jacobins of being themselves torn to pieces by the wild beasts they had unchained.

Dreux, nothing discouraged, resolved to attempt the execution of the order by himself. It was now between four and five o'clock afternoon, and the massacres were proceeding with active cruelty at the Abbaye. As he approached the prison, he saw Manuel, who was attempting to calm the fury of the populace, though perhaps not with much sincerity, and certainly with very slight hopes of success. He joined him; and, after relating the refusal of the commissaries of the section of Cordeliers, he entreated him to see the order personally executed. Manuel repulsed him, saying that he came there to discharge his public duty, and not to listen to private petitions, and then commenced haranguing the people. His voice was naturally feeble, and he was frequently inaudible during the tumult. Dreux, to conciliate his favour, repeated his words, phrase by phrase, in a loud tone, and terminated by exclaiming—(what Manuel himself did not probably utter)—"None but villains would be guilty of such dreadful excesses, and trample all laws under foot." At the word "villains," unpalatable to the ears of such an audience, loud murmurs arose, and menaces were hurled against Manuel and his interpreter. Dreux took the magistrate by the sleeve, warned him of his danger, removed his scarf of office, and dragged him out of the crowd; and, having called a hackney coach, they returned together to the Hôtel de Ville. Dreux cherished the hope of there finding a commissary to supply the place of those from whom he had received refusals. On their arrival, Manuel explained the risk he had run, and declared that his life had been saved by the young citizen present. Great applause followed this statement; and one of the committee voted thanks to the preserver of Manuel, and moved that his name should be inscribed on the public register. The young man expressed his acknowledgments; but observed that he had done no more than his duty, and objected to give his name. All that he asked, as the reward of his services, was the attendance of a commissary to execute the order of which he was the bearer; but he again met the same refusal as at the Cordeliers, and saw himself reduced to his own personal exertions.

To reach the Abbaye, and execute his bold and generous purpose, he had need of assistance, and required to be armed. By chance, he stumbled on a young acquaintance, whom he persuaded to accompany him. They proceeded forthwith to the house in which the Abbé Godard had lodged before his arrest—there he obtained a musket and bayonet, and his friend a sabre. Arrived at the Abbaye, they forced their way through the crowd, and gained the gate of the lower hall, in which Dreux had ascertained from the gaoler that his friend was confined. The avenues were not, at that hour, blocked up by the populace, who were ignorant of the number of the prisoners, on account of some precautions of the gaoler, which we shall presently notice. Dreux now shewed his order from Manuel to the gaoler; but he said that he was only one of the subalterns, and that he could not take the responsibility on himself; and he, moreover, remarked, that the order required the presence of a commissary of one of the sections. Dreux laboured hard to conquer this resistance, and at once offered the gaoler an assignat for fifty francs, and promised him two hundred and fifty francs more when the prisoner was at liberty. The gaoler was now somewhat softened, but still gave no positive promise; and Dreux saw the necessity of not abandoning his post. He assumed the character of a sentinel at the gate; and, under this pretext, he prevented any crowd being collected, observing that, if he allowed a group of four, it would soon swell to ten, twenty, or a hundred. To effect this, he kept calling out, in a rude and brutal tone of voice—"No one passes this way;" and when any attempted to resist him, he exclaimed—"What! do you wish to force the guard?"

In the apartment watched by Dreux, about sixty individuals were confined, who had been conducted thither on the night of Saturday, and on Sunday morning. No one but an eye-witness can adequately paint this torturing scene. The unhappy victims hourly expected death from the hints they received during their removal, and their alarms were increased by hearing the report of cannon, and the wild imprecations of the mob; and, when the fearful massacre actually commenced, even hope itself, the last mortal comfort in adversity, vanished. Several times the gaoler entered the apartment, and told them that the People threatened to break in, but that they might be assured of protection, as the National Guard would defend them. This, however, was false; for not a soldier of the National Guard was present. About seven o'clock, he told them that the prisoners in all the other cells had been slaughtered; but, if they would cease talking, and extinguish their lights, they might have the good luck to be passed unnoticed. This advice they followed, but they only heard more distinctly the execrations of the people, and the groans of the dying.

The Abbé Godard had observed a window in the apartment, somewhat lofty, but still accessible. He was raised up to it, and perceived, underneath, a small courtyard, into which it was easy to descend. He apprized his companions of this discovery, who resolved to avail themselves of the chance of escape. The night was advancing, and every moment their situation became more perilous. The Marseillais, and the other tigers in human form, prowled round the spot where they had scented their prey, and collected at the gate in increasing numbers; several had offered to relieve Dreux, but he peremptorily refused, saying that he was not tired; and when some more importunate insisted on taking his place, he made use of their own style of language, saying—"How do I know but that you want me to quit my post to betray the nation? Here I shall remain as a good patriot."

At length, towards midnight, the ferocious ruffians thronging all the avenues to the apartment in which the prisoners were confined, and demanding, with loud shouts, that they should be delivered up; the gaoler, fearing to lose his own life, approached the door against which Dreux was stationed. He merely moved enough to allow the arm of the gaoler to pass between the wall and his body. As he was putting the key into the key-hole, Dreux, who had rested the butt-end of his musket on the ground, pressed the end of his bayonet gently against his side, and looked at him with a pointedness of gesture, signifying that he now expected him to produce the order of Manuel. The gaoler took the hint, and, at the time that he withdrew the key, he took the order out of his pocket, and thus addressed the gang of assassins:—"Gentlemen, I must inform you, before opening the door, that I am the bearer of an order from M. Manuel, Procureur of the Committee, commanding me to release one of the prisoners now in this apartment."

"An order from M. Manuel!" instantly exclaimed Dreux. "M. Manuel is a Magistrate of the People and a good citizen; but I must see the order myself." He then took it from the hands of the gaoler, pretending to examine it and verify the signature; after which he read the contents with a loud voice, omitting the clause of the Abbé Godard not having given the bail for his citizenship, but dwelling strongly on the counter-signatures of Montmore, and other Agitators of the People, which were appended to the order; then putting the paper on the ground, that it might be seen by those nearest to him by torch light, (not one of whom, in all probability, could read,) he called on all of them to obey the commands of the magistrate. The gaoler opened the door, and called out—"M. Godard, come out; M. Manuel releases you." No reply. Dreux and his comrade repeated the summons at the top of their lungs. Still there was a profound silence. The Abbé was no longer in the apartment;—he had passed, with eight or ten others, through the window, and descended into the little court-yard.

The despair of Dreux, at this moment, must have been intense and heart-breaking. He could not persuade himself that his friend was out of the apartment. Seizing a torch, he traversed it, calling him by name, inspecting every corner, throwing the light on every countenance, and betraying by his emotions the personal anxiety he felt for a prisoner, whom, up to that moment, he pretended not to know. But he searched in vain, and saw all his efforts fruitless, and all his fondest expectations disappointed. Where could he find his benefactor? Was he yet alive, or had he been removed to one of the other apartments which the assassins had already dyed with blood? How resolve this appalling incertitude ? At length his eye caught the window, and he then felt sure the Abbé had escaped through it. His next care was to ascertain what was below the window, and how he could reach the spot.

The lively interest that Dreux had displayed to find the Abbé Godard, and the evident chagrin he manifested at his want of success, at last rendered him suspected. Some of the brigands, by whom he was surrounded, communicated their suspicions to their confederates ; Dreux made no attempt to justify himself verbally, for he was sagacious enough to know that any such plea would only have increased his danger ; with a presence of mind truly astonishing, he rudely seized one of the unfortunate priests by the arm, and dragged him towards the door with menacing words and brutal gesticulation. This unhappy ecclesiastic, who had frequently seen Dreux at the Mairie, when visiting the Abbé Godard, imagined, naturally enough, that, as the young man could not save his friend, he would endeavour to save him instead. He warmly clasped the hand of his supposed deliverer. Dreux discovering the error by the gestures of the poor creature, experienced a mental pang not to be expressed by words ; but, firmly resolved to rescue his benefactor, he unloosened the hand of the priest, though he knew—powerless however to prevent it—that he would fall among the first victims. At this very moment, the general massacre commenced, and all in the apartment fell under the knives of the butchers.

Escaped himself from so imminent a danger, and followed at a distance by his companion and a third person—the tenant of the Abbé Godard, who, on his return from the country, had hastened to the Abbaye to ascertain his fate—Dreux now endeavoured to find the gate which led to the small court-yard. In his search he came to a narrow lane bounded by a low wall, which he supposed was the boundary of the court-yard ; a heap of stones thrown loosely against this wall, enabled him to look over it, and his conjecture was verified. By the moonlight he clearly saw eight or ten persons, among whom he recognised the Abbé Godard by his lofty stature. While he was making these observations, another man mounted on the same heap of stones, but with totally opposite intentions. He was armed with a musket, and about to fire into the group. Dreux still preserved his presence of mind, and, turning himself rapidly round, he struck the musket from the hands of the assassin, as through accident, and apologized to him for his awkwardness ; they then both descended together to find it, when Dreux gave him the slip. He immediately joined his two friends, and being now satisfied of the real situation of the Abbé, he posted himself at the gate which led into the court-yard. He would have remained there in a state of inaction, could he have done so ; but the People were collecting in that quarter, and the murderers had arrived. As he had no gaoler with him to restrain the mob, the assassins insisted on breaking open the door. Dreux, having demanded and obtained silence, repeated the order of Manuel to those around him ; and as several of these had already heard it read, they promised to save the prisoner.

The door was now forced ; the name of Stephen Godard was called ; he seeing bayonets fixed and naked sabres, believed that he was about to rush on certain death, and that he was only distinguished from his companions to meet a more cruel fate ; for he had not yet recognised the voice of Dreux. We may imagine his surprise when he saw his friend, who, aided by his two companions, penetrated through the crowd, and, seizing him by the arm, dragged him through a small passage which led into the chapel. It was now one o'clock in the morning ; a meeting of the Section was about to be held ; the porter had closed all the gates, excepting that through which Dreux and his companions had entered. They were certain that the assassins would immediately pursue, into the chapel, those who might there seek shelter ; and indeed this happened within a few minutes afterwards. After many entreaties and menaces, they prevailed on the porter to open the great gate, and they then rushed forward, pretending that they were in pursuit of some run-a-ways, shouting "Venez par ici ; ils sont par-là ! Vive la nation !" They fortunately escaped another crowd, assembled, on the opposite side of the Abbaye, for similar purposes, and, finally, reached in safety the Rue Sainte Marguerite.

In thus saving his benefactor from so many dangers, Dreux was the instrument, under Providence, of performing another good action. A poor priest, who had fled, like them, into the chapel, and not knowing how to get out, was concealed behind the door ; on seeing them approach, took them for some of the assassins. This unhappy man had no hat, and wore the ecclesiastical costume, which circumstances greatly increased his personal danger, as well as the difficulty of those who might attempt to save him. He was a poor curate, arrested at fifteen leagues from Paris, by the Federals, in a château where he was on a temporary visit ; and for this public crime against the majesty of the People, he was incarcerated in the Abbaye. One of the young men gave him a hat, and he passed out, in the midst of the crowd, unobserved, in the darkness and tumult. As he had been thrown into prison immediately on his arrival at Paris, he was not provided with any lodging, and it was unsafe to take him to any public house ; at length, he remembered an acquaintance who lived at the Cloister of Saint Jacques-de-la-Boucherie, whither the tenant of the Abbé Godard conducted him safe and sound.

The authenticity of this narrative in all its details may be implicitly depended on, the writer having obtained the facts many years since from the Abbé Morellet, the intimate friend of the Abbé Godard, who related to him all the particulars of his wonderful escape.

Six Years' Residence in the Australian Provinces, with an account of New Zealand. By W. Mann, Esq.

Dr Laing has left little to tell about New South Wales; and the Van Diemen's Land Almanac, and other recent publications, keep the public at home pretty well up with the current history of Van Diemen's Land; so that original information is not to be expected, save about the condition and prospects of the more recent settlements. After passing some sharp remarks on certain absurd regulations adopted by the commissioners for the colony of South Australia, Mr Mann writes:—

The worthy Commissioners who never saw Australia, seem to think that it is a terrestrial paradise, where there are neither rocks, sandy deserts, nor mountains, but that it is all a perfect Eden; so that, according to their first prospectus of this enchanting country, the products are described to be in perspective—"cotton, almonds, aniseed, bees'-wax and honey, barilla, cheese for India and China, carraway, cochineal, coriander, dried fruits, hops, vegetable oils, olives, citrons, oranges, and silk." These, of course, are principally articles of luxury; for as to the common produce of a less favoured land, they would not be at the trouble of enumerating them, being conscious, I presume, that the fertility of the soil, and the fine climate they describe, would refuse to produce such common articles as corn, or leguminous produce. In this opinion they were tolerably correct; for in the month of December last, although they had been then two years established in the colony, they had not two acres of corn in cultivation. I was told that there was some wheat sown in North Adelaide, where I went to see such a curiosity; and on arriving at the garden belonging to Mr Hack, I perceived that some wheat had been reaped—the straw remarkably short, and the grain shrivelled, and not half an average crop. I was informed that there was a much better specimen of wheat to be seen at a garden belonging to Mr Beare, which I had also the curiosity to inspect, and on my way met with a gentleman to whom I had been introduced at Adelaide, Surgeon Jameson, who had served under General Evans in his late Spanish campaign. He consented to accompany me; and after some difficulty, from the great distance at which the huts are asunder, we discovered the garden of wheat; it was too short for reaping, and a mower was endeavouring to cut it with a scythe; but it was so thin, that he could not form what is called, in farming phrase, a swathe; in consequence a man followed him with a rake, to collect the scattered heads of corn. From the high price of labour, which is seven shillings per day for a common labourer, it was our opinion that the produce would not pay the cost that produced it.

The travellers made their excursion to the mountains on foot, during weather with the thermometer at 90° in the shade. The report is—

On the first range there was good kangaroo grass; but the declivities were too precipitous for sheep, and the ravines were so narrow at the bottom, which appeared to be cut up by torrents in winter, that a person might step across from the base of one declivity to another. I should suppose that these hills might suit the experiment of rearing the Cashmere and Angora goat. The former produces about an ounce of fine silky wool, of which the famous Cashmere shawls are made; the latter, I believe, produces mohair; and for this purpose these hills might perhaps be worth one shilling per acre. Near, and on the summit of the range, the land is utterly valueless, except for the timber which it at present contains; being covered principally with loose stones and rocks, with little or no vegetation fit for animals of any kind. Some parts of the ranges are so steep that they would require scaling-ladders to ascend them. The morning being serene and clear, we had a fine view of the surrounding country, until we arrived at a wooden house built by a Swede, in the style of his country, for a man named Crawford, who keeps a house of entertainment for passengers crossing these dreary regions.

They ascended Mount Lofty, and, from the summit, had a fine and extensive view. Mr Mann is all for Port Lincoln, and against the city and harbour of Adelaide. The present price of provisions is incidentally noticed:—

We were accompanied by two guides to the summit of Mount Lofty; one of whom, Peter Johnson, a Swede, stated that he could live better in Sweden on one shilling a-day than he could in South Australia for ten shillings a-day; for that every article and necessary of life was dear in proportion to the amount of the wages. The other guide was an Irishman, named Brennan, who earned good wages by felling and splitting timber for the use of the colony. They would not take any money for their trouble, stating that they had enough to supply their wants. We returned the following day to Adelaide, calling at a gentleman's house at the foot of the Tiers, who kindly gave us a refreshment. He had people engaged in sinking a well:—they had gone to the depth of 110 feet without procuring water. He and his brother had lately left India, bringing some coolies with them, who, they think, will suit the labour in the summer months better than English constitutions, in South Australia.

The cost of enclosing an acre of ground forming an allotment, in the city of Adelaide, was L.54:9s.; and a gentleman, holding an official situation, had paid L.300 for enclosing twelve acres, with the addition of a fence, formed of posts and rails, across it, and dividing it. But land cannot be cultivated safely until it is enclosed. Mr Mann met with a gentleman at Adelaide, lately from England, whose situation is, too probably, that of many.

He had been fortunate enough, as he thought, to get a preliminary section, and his brother another section, who had already gone there to take possession of it in time, lest others might have a previous selection. His hopes respecting realizing a fortune in a short time were such as a sanguine temperament, unalloyed with the reality of the case, is apt to imagine. I met him in Adelaide shortly after his inspection of the allotment, and he told me that his brother had selected both the allotments contiguous to each other, at the foot of the Tiers, on a large plain, but was at a loss to know what to do with them. To enclose them would be ruinous, and they were worth nothing without it for any purpose; and even then, with labour at the enormous rate of seven shillings per day, what was to be done? His brother had purchased a few sheep; but they were constantly straying away. He wanted to sell his allotment, but could get nothing for it; and requested his brother to dispose of it in the best manner he could, and to write to prevent the family from following them, which had been their intention, whilst he returned to Launceston in the same ship he had embarked in from thence, in despair of being able to do anything for himself or friends in South Australia.

The average range of Fahrenheit's thermometer during that part of the month of December, 1838, in which I remained at Adelaide, was 89° in the shade, and 110° in the sun, and this was only the second month of the Australian summer. The months of January and February are much warmer. Vegetation lingered. The produce of the gardens, except the melon and cucumber, appeared dry and parched. A hive of bees, which a passenger on board our ship had brought from Van Diemen's Land, seemed scarcely able to support itself with food, from the paucity of blossoms and flowers of plants and shrubs.

The parrot-tribe are various and beautiful, and the water-fowl are abundant, and as various as in other parts of New Holland.

A report is given by our author, which was sent in by Mr Wood, Commander of the Queen's ship, Buffalo, to Governor Hindmarsh, and at his desire. It is most unfavourable, in every respect, to the harbour of Port Adelaide. It concludes thus:—

"In offering this statement, my best judgment has been used, aided by the experience of upwards of forty years in constant employment, out of which twenty-eight were passed in His Majesty's service, bearing the responsibility of Master in one or other ships of war, acting as pilot in all cases during that period, happily without an accident; which leads me to declare that I would not risk, or attempt to recommend, a vessel of more than between three or four hundred tons, or drawing more than twelve or thirteen feet, to use the harbour at present."

And such is the miserable place selected by the colonists. After escaping all the dangers and inconveniences pointed out by this experienced and skilful person, you at length arrive at a ditch, where you can only work at particular times of tide, which are exceedingly irregular. Fresh water is scarce and dear: the water for the Buffalo cost near £100, when put on board! What infatuation, then,—what madness must have possessed the people, who could prefer such a place to Port Lincoln, where there is plenty of fresh water, and where all the fleets of Great Britain could ride secure!

The present expense of conveying goods from the harbour to the city is nearly equal to the cost of their freight from England to South Australia. In December last, the Governor had issued orders for establishing a new port, four miles farther off from the capital, but much safer, and more convenient.

During a shower, one day, Mr Mann took shelter in one of the small mud huts on the side of the Torrens—the tiny stream which, at some seasons, runs briskly through Adelaide, but which, in summer, is dried up.

The hut consisted of only one room, in one end of which was a bed; a fireplace, in which were a few embers, occupied the opposite end: the gables were built with dried balls of earth, without any cement. The furniture consisted of only a few articles necessary for culinary purposes. I inquired of the woman of what trade was her husband. She replied that he was a boot-closer, but could get no employment; that she was a person who had been employed in London as a semstress; that her husband had gone out to try to get some work as a day-labourer, which, she said, he did not understand; and exclaimed, with a sigh, that London folk had no business there.

The way in which "speculating business" is done in this and other new colonies, is graphically described; and, upon the whole, the condition and prospects of South Australia are not, by this author's account, either flattering to emigrants or satisfactory to the present settlers.

The account of New Zealand, which the author has not visited, is a meagre compilation. The most interesting part of it is the correspondence of different natives with their late missionary teacher, Mr Yate, and other missionaries who have been labouring among them, not, as we have lately seen from Dr Lang's Letter on New Zealand, without their earthly reward. A chief, named Atua Haere, who had been converted to Christianity, was attempting, with others, to build a chapel or "House of Prayer." It fell down, and the chief writes to Mr Yate, the now disgraced head of the mission:—

And when the house of prayer was down, that I thought, in my thoughts, would be ready in two weeks for you and Mr Davis to come, and Mr Clarke and Hamlin to come and instruct us in, I cried; and my heart and my people's hearts were pained, and became dark; and we said, "It is no use, we cannot build a house large enough;" and then you sent Kohuka, your son, whom you redeemed from slavery, to come and help us, and shew us how; and our hearts became light, and we went to work again, and the roof is now fast. Mr Yate, you must come to Kaikohi, Mura, and Wahanga, and Kaha, will come and carry your cloth-house [meaning a tent,] and clothes. Waha is gone into the wood to shoot some pigeons and tuis for you. I have a little pig, that I will kill when your horse appears in sight; and Piro's wife will wash your potatoes, because you do not have them cooked with the skin scraped. Come, and point out, and call those who are to go to Waimate, that you say you will baptize.—No more writing from Atua Haere to Mr Yate. Sit in peace. By Mura is this slate written; the words were spoken by ATUA HÆRE, sitting by the side of Kekeao, from Pukenui.

The next letter is from a man and his wife, who had been servants to some of the missionaries, and baptized by the names of Henry and Rebecca:—

From Henry and Rebecca Wahanga.

Father, Mr Yate.—Is the sacred Supper a remembrance of Jesus the Saviour's dying upon a tree for us—for me, and for my wife Rebecca, and for you? My soul is happy, because it knows of the love of God: and I wish to know something more, and to remember more of the great and good things which God hath done for me by Jesus Christ; and I want more to fulfil His will, and to do His bidding. My old heart is not carried away yet: it remains inside me: and when I am on my bed at night, my heart says, "Henry do something that is not good to-morrow;" and then my thoughts think about it; and then to-morrow I think about it again; and my native heart says, "Do it!" and I think again, and then I do it: and then my thoughts tell me I was wrong; and my heart tells me I am an unbelieving bad man: and then Satan comes, and tells me I am none of Jesus Christ's, but of his, and shall go to his place, and do his work for ever and ever. Mr Yate, what do you think? You have brought the Scriptures, printed, from the other side of the water, and I have got a book: and Rebecca says, I must read it to her when she is ill, bringing to the birth; and I must look into it every day, every day, and pray more to God when I am reading; and I shall soon altogether know what I am to do, or to be done with. Your heart, and Mr Kemp's, and Mr Davis', and all of yours, are always thinking good; but, as for ours!—! Rebecca says, this is to be Her letter and My letter; for they are our two's thoughts, and our hearts are one. This is all from us two, from HENRY WAHANGA, and REBECCA WAHANGA, to our father, Mr Yate, living at the Waimate.

From the Chief Hotaiwa to the Rev. W. Yate.

I send one of my slaves with this book, written for me by Thomas Reo, for Mr Yate, at the Waimate. Finished is the road through the wood, for your horse and you to come to my residence at Mangakahia. Come, come, come: we are waiting to hear you say, "It is a good road." Perhaps you will say it is good—perhaps bad. We were thirty-five men, three weeks and four days, and we all say, "No, no payment must we have for this work." It is a road for the Teachers to come to teach us, and tell us about Jesus Christ. This is our payment: this is our satisfaction. You have only been four times to Mangakahia: but now the road is made, you must come every moon, that we may not forget your words, nor your books, nor the Catechism which you teach us. Come soon, and hastily, our friend, Mr Yate. I have taken care of your axe and piece of soap.

Nor more writing from HOTAIWA to the Pracher of the Gospel, sometimes at Mangakahia, and sometimes at the Waimate.

From Temorenga to the Rev. W. Yate.

From Temorenga is this writing to Mr Yate. My two friends carry on their back, in two baskets, nine two's of fowls. They are a gift-for-nothing from me to you, for you to eat on board the man-of-war, when on the great sea. Be jealous and careful of the waves on the great sea. Oh, how great they were, when I went up to Mr Marsden's, at Port Jackson! Remember, that it was Temorenga who sat in our verandah, at your house-door, and told you all about native men's ways. Do not forget who I am, and what I have said to you. Bring out one, two, three, perhaps more, Missionaries to go to the Southern Tribes, that there may be no more fighting between us here and them there. Bring your sister in the ship with you; and do not forget what I, Temorenga, have said, that you shall have house at the Manawenua, if the other natives should ever be turned against you, and they should not let the Missionaries live in the land. A native man's heart is very deceitful and very joking. Let my men, who carry the fowls for you to eat on board the man-of-war, carry me back one fig of tobacco, as my pipe is empty. Go in peace, and see your friends in England.

One man writes:—

I am very dark and sorry within me that a ship is going to sail with you in her from this native land. My wife has made some bands for parsons; and a pair of something for the wrists of English women, such as Mrs Matthews and Mrs Busby wear. You must give them in England to them that your heart says you love. Go in peace, Mr Yate: go, and do not be overtaken with storms and hurricanes. Go in peace to England, and leave us all to cry when you are gone. This is all my last slate to you, from me.

Even if all genuine, there must have been some little prompting at the filling of these "slates;" yet the epistles certainly discover something of the native mind.

One man writes:—

To the man whose name is Yate, and who comes to teach us here.

Here am I, sitting in the verandah of my house at Ohaiawai, thinking within me that I shall not see your face again, nor hear the sound of your horse's feet. The soles of his feet, with you upon his back, will not leave a mark behind them on my ground again till I am dead, and Paitaro is become the head Chief of Mangakaaukau.

A chief wrote thus to William IV. by the ship Buffalo:—

King William—Here am I, the friend of Captain Sadler: the ship is full, and is now about to sail. I have heard that you, sometime, were the captain of a ship. Do you therefore examine the spars, whether they are good, or whether they are bad. Should you and the French quarrel, here are some trees for your battle-ships. I am now beginning to think about a ship for myself; a native canoe is my vessel, and I have nothing else. The native canoes upset, when they are filled with potatoes and other matters for your people. I have put on board the Buffalo a mere pounamu and two garments: these are all the things which New Zealanders possess. If I had anything better, I would give it to Captain Sadler for you.

This is all mine to you—mine,

TITORE to WILLIAM, the King of England.

From Ate to the Rev. W. Yate.

Mr Yate—How do you do? Sick is my heart for a blanket. Yes, forgotten have you the young pigs I gave you last summer. My pipe is gone out, and there is no tobacco with me to fill it; where should I have tobacco? Remember the pigs which I gave you: you have not given me anything for them. Forgotten have you the ornaments that I took off my boy's neck and threw at your feet? Mr Yate, I do not forget you: my pipe is empty, there is nothing in it: give some tobacco to me, and give me a blanket also. I am your friend, and you are my friend; and I fed you with sucking-pigs; therefore, I say, do not forget. Speak my name to King William; tell him I am sitting in peace, and listening to you.

We are afraid that this Rev. gentleman, who would seem to be so very popular among the natives, is the same individual against whom certain black mysterious charges have been brought forward, and who has been dismissed in disgrace by the Missionary Society. If innocent, Mr Yate is certainly a deeply injured man.

Upon the whole, we cannot say that Mr Mann's book adds much to the sum of existing knowledge respecting the Southern Colonies; yet his work should be perused, in common with everything written on the subject, by those who are meditating the important because generally irretrievable step of emigration.

Sketches in Ireland.

These Sketches are by the author of the amusing "Tour in Connaught," which we lately noticed—the Rev. Caesar Otway. Though prior in date to the "Tour," they are still, we believe, very little known in Britain. Ireland was, at the time they appeared, nearly a terra incognita to travellers; save, probably those choice bits, the county Wicklow scenery, and the Lakes of Killarney. The British people have made more progress towards intimate and amicable acquaintance with the sister island within the last seven years than in a whole previous century.

Though the agitation which produced and followed Catholic Emancipation, and the introduction of a new class of Irish representatives, have done their part, the press has accomplished, if not all, yet much of the good work in which it led the way. Miss Edgeworth, Lady Morgan, Banim, and others, had already acted as the national pioneers, and also as guides to Ireland; and in teaching us to know, taught us to love the Irish people. In the same good work, the author of these Sketches has borne his part; and although we, living beyond the influence of the ever-active causes of his jealousy and irritation, would like to see him display a little more indulgence even for the faults of his Roman Catholic brethren, Mr Otway is a true Irishman, and no Orangeman.

The Sketches are made in the picturesque and mountainous parts of Ulster, Cork, and Kerry; and they, like the "Tour," deal largely with local traditions, as well as living characters, and "manners as they rise." The following tale of the famous Sir Cahir O'Doherty may match with the wildest, though not the most ferocious of the Highland clan chronicles of Mr Gregory. The date is the reign of James I.

The plantation of Ulster had not as yet taken place; but already many Scots had settled themselves along the rich alluvial lands that border the Loughs Foyle and Swilly; and it was Sir Cahir's most desired end and aim to extirpate these intruders, hateful as strangers, detestable as heretics. He was the Scotman's curse and scourge. One of these industrious Scots had settled in the valley of the Lennan; Rory O'Donnell, the Queen's Earl of Tyrconnell, had given him part of that fertile valley, and he there built his bawn. But Sir Cahir, in the midst of night, and in Sandy Ramsay's absence, attacked his enclosure, drove off his cattle, slaughtered his wife and children, and left his pleasant homestead a heap of smoking ruins.

The Scot, on his return home, saw himself bereaved, left desolate in a foreign land, without property, kindred, or home; nothing his but his true gun and dirk. He knew that five hundred marks were the reward offered by the Lord Deputy for Sir Cahir's head. He knew that this outlaw was the foe that had quenched the fire on his hearth with the blood of his wife and little ones; and with a heart maddened by revenge, with hope resting on the promised reward, he retired to the wooded hills that run parallel to the Hill of Doune; there, under covert of a rock, his gun resting on the withered branch of a stunted oak, he waited day by day, with all the patience and expectancy of a tiger in his lair. Sir Cahir was a man to be marked in a thousand; he was the loftiest and proudest in his bearing of any man in the province of Ulster; his Spanish hat with the heron's plume was too often the terror of his enemies, the rallying point of his friends, not to bespeak the O'Doherty; even the high breastwork of loose stones, added to the natural defences of the rock, could not hide the chieftain from observation.

On Holy Thursday, as he rested on the eastern face of the rock, looking towards the Abbey of Kilmacrenan, expecting a venerable friar to come from this favoured foundation of St Columbkille to shrieve him and celebrate mass, and as he was chatting to his men beside him, the Scotchman applied the fire to his levelled matchlock, and before the report began to roll its echoes through the woods and hills, the ball had passed through Sir Cahir's forehead, and he lay lifeless on the ramparts. His followers were panic-struck; they thought that the rising of the Scotch and English was upon them, and, deserting the lifeless body of their leader, they dispersed through the mountains. In the meanwhile, the Scotchman approached the rock; he saw his foe fall; he saw his followers flee. He soon severed the head from the body, and, wrapping it in his plaid, off he set in the direction of Dublin. He travelled all that day, and at night took shelter in a cabin belonging to one Terence Gallagher, situated at one of the fords of the river Finn. Here Ramsey sought a night's lodging, which Irishmen never refuse; and, partaking of an oatmeal cake and some sweet milk, he went to rest with Sir Cahir's head under his own as a pillow. The Scotchman slept sound, and Terence was up at break of day. He saw blood oozing out through the plaid that served as his guest's pillow, and suspected all was not right; so, alighting the tartan plaid, he saw the hair and head of a man. Slowly drawing it out, he recognised features well known to every man in Tyrconnell; they were Sir Cahir's. Terence knew as well as any man that there was a price set on this very head—a price abundant to make his fortune—a price he now was resolved to try and gain. So off Terence started, and broad Tyrone was almost crossed by O'Gallagher, before the Scotchman awoke to resume his journey. The story is still told with triumph through the country, how the Irishman, without the treason, reaped the reward of Sir Cahir's death. This was the last of the Irish rebellions that took place before the plantation of Ulster.

Sir Cahir's body was buried beside the rock. Tony O'Donnell, who accompanied us, shewed us his green grave, and seemed to hold the memory of this rebel in the respect due to his opposition to the English yoke and English religion.

The guide to the Chieftain of Tyrconnell's grave, (by name Tony O'Donnell,) was an adept in fairy lore. His tales are exact parallels to those which flourished in Scotland till within the last half century. The Ettrick Shepherd, and other competent authorities, attribute the decreasing power of the Good People, and, alas! their total disappearance, to the spread of the Gospel; but Tony O'Donnell has a theory of his own, which does not however, exclude the clergy.

"Why to what should it be owing but to yonder blessed well? From the day that Father Freel sanctified that holy water, the good people have scampered off; and, oh, but it was the world's trouble to Friar Freel to bless this well. He knew rightly that there was a holy well wanting in this quarter, and he prayed to St Patrick and to St Columbkille to tell him where he should find one that was proper to fix upon and bless. So the holy saints appeared to him in a dream, and desired him to go to six different wells and take six rushes with him, and dip a rush in each well, and then set fire to them, and whatever rush took fire and burned bright, as if it was dipped in rosin or tallow, that then the well in which the burning rush was dipped should be made holy for ever after.

"So according to these directions the good friar proceeded; he provided himself with rushes, and went and dipped them in the best spring wells of the country, and then he set fire to them, but not one of them would burn. At last he came to Doune, and here he dipped his rush, and the moment he took it out of the water and applied a coal of turf to it—why, my dear sowl, a blaze came from the wet rush as bright as from one of the tapers on our chapel altar; and it continued burning clear and steady the whole day and next night. So here Father Freel stopped, he fasted and prayed six days and six nights, going round the well on his bare knees, and this being finished, the sanctity of it has grown in grace, and character and virtue, ever since. At first it was only good for the cure of cattle, the murrain and the black-leg; and then it came on to cure horses of mange, strangles, and surfeits; but now it cures Christians; and look, sir, at all these crutches stuck round the well: look at these hand-barrows. I saw myself with my two eyes, the bed-ridden come here on these crutches, and they went away, after going their rounds, as straight and nimble as you or I, and they left these things behind, as well they might, to prove and to certify God's wonders done unto them at this holy well.

"Sir," said he, "the black-mouthed Presbyterians there below on the Lennan, are forced to confess and believe in the wonders of this well. Not long ago, a bitter psalm-singing Presbyterian, who farms part of the townland of Drumgarron, his name is John M'Clure; he used to laugh at us poor Catholics as we passed him by, going to this blessed spot—Oh! it would make your flesh creep to hear all he said, turning the sacred well into game; but one spring, just as we were going to labour the ground for the barley, his horses took the mange, and they got so lean that they were dropping off their standing; they could not plough his field, they were unable to crawl to the bog to bring home a creel of turf. He tried brimstone with them, but it did not do; all the tobacco-water and sulphur in Derry had no effect; so, says he, half joke half earnest, to his neighbour Jerry M'Swine, 'I'll go to the well of Doune and wash my horses with your holy water, and who knows but the saint will cure a Presbyterian's horse as well as a Catholic's cow.' So off he set with his horses, and he brings a pail with him to lift the water, and when he came near the well, as he could not lead his horses close to it by reason of the bog, he tied the cattle to a stone, and down he went to fetch the water, and raising it with his pail, off he set to dash it over his horses. But, my dear honey, he had not gone ten steps from the well, when the pail, as if it had no bottom, let out all the water; back he goes again, but no better was his bad luck, he might have been lifting the water until Lady Day, and yet not one drop of the blessed liquor would the heretic be permitted to carry, it stole out of the pail as it would out of a sieve; at length, of a sudden, dimness came over the man's eyes, and it would make you laugh to see Johnny M'Clure wandering about the bogs as blind as a beetle, tumbling into the bog-holes, rolling and weltering in the mud. At length fear came on the man, and the grace of God gave him a good thought, and he vowed to the blessed Mary and the saints, that if he recovered his sight he would go to mass on next Sunday. The moment he said this, he saw his eye-sight come; up he bounced, ran to the well and took a hearty drink, and he became as good a Catholic, and as happy a man, as ever you saw; immediately he took up the pail, lifted it full of water, which the pail now carried as staunch as need be, and a Catholic neighbour making the sign of the cross while he washed the horses with the water, in a hand's turn, (as I may say,) they became as clean and sound as a trout, and Jack M'Clure went home, his cattle cured, and he a good Catholic, which he remained to his dying day."

This story Tony O'Donnell told with all theunction of perfect faith—I verily believe he placed a full reliance on the truth of what he narrated. This well is in the highest odour of credit in this vicinity—its efficacy is notorious in sundry ways. One virtue it has for which its fame deserves to extend beyond this mountain district—good housewives use it as a sovereign and certain alexipharmic against infidelity in husbands; nothing need be done but keep a bottle of this sacred water well corked under the bed's head, and the good man of the house remains as he should be, true and faithful. A valuable well is not this? and highly to be prized this anti-jealousy water—pity it is so little known beyond these hills; even Protestant ladies are known to rely on and to experience the full efficacy of this simple remedy against a very troublesome evil.

The Sketcher speculates rather facetiously, for one of his grave calling, on the utility of opening a trade with London and Paris, in this precious and peace-making fluid. To the pilgrims whom he saw crawling around the well, he doubts not that a drop of poteen, to be got in a neighbouring cabin, a dash of the elixir illegalis, considerably furthers the sanative and other blessed effects of Father Freel's potent elixir.

We never before had any proper idea of the prowess and early feats of the misanthropic St Columbkil, who, in his own northern province, out-Heroded the great St Patrick; and particularly in cursing "the varmint." Some odd anecdotes may be found in this volume of conversions to the Church of Rome. One man was driven into its bosom by the humorous and mischievous ghost or spirit of his father, which the priest, when at last applied to by the haunted Protestant, could not undertake to lay, unless the applicant, Terry M'Cullum, becomes a good Catholic. The story was told to the SKETCHER by his friend's herd, Amy M'Ilwee, among many others equally wonderful. The Irish Hamlet—driven nearly distracted by his father's spiteful spirit,—“the most mischievous that ever came out o' Purgathory,” said Amy, “breaking the heads of the men, and doing all manner of damage to the glass, pewter, and chany; throwing soot into the punch, and so forth—applied to Father Phelim the priest.”

And to be sure he received Jerry M'Cullum in his parlour most genteelly.

“Why, father, I suppose you have heard of my sore troubles, and how I have neither prosperity by day, nor rest by night. My father's ghost is sure to be the ruin of me.”

“But why, Mr M'Cullum, should you come to me? You were never under my knee—you were never at my mass—you have lived without my sacraments—you have paid me no DUES—you keep no more fasts than a dog—and the church holds you as a heathen and a publican. WHAT HAVE YOU TO DO WITH ME, MR JERRY M'CULLUM?”

“Och! but father dear, do but come this once and lay this cruel ghost, and I promise you that I and all belonging to me will go to mass, and do your bidding all the days of our lives.”

“Do you say so?” says the priest. “Will you give me your Bible oath, that neither you nor yours, in secula seculorum, will ever darken a church or meeting-house door? that you will come to my altar, fast on Friday, come to confession at Easter, and take and conform to the rosary of the Virgin? Swear, I say, by the cross and by this book, you will thus mind my bidding, and come home to the open arms of our mother the church, and I will go in the name of the Virgin, St Patrick, and St Columbkil, and lay the ghost in the Red Sea.”

“Jerry swore and crossed himself willingly; and that very night the priest proceeded in his vestments, and with his breviary and his bell, and a bottle of holy water, and the clerk of the chapel bearing two holy candles. He marched up and down the house; he read all the sacred Latin prayers; he challenged and he chid the ghost; he commanded it with a strong voice to return to its own place, for the work was done, and there was no more occasion for it to walk under the moon; and then the holy man closed his book, and ordered the holy water to be sprinkled; the bell was rung, the blessed candles were put out; and from that day to this, Jerry's house is quiet, and he and all his seed and breed are good Catholics.”

Amy told me this with much feeling; and, in the ardour of his religion, and in the interest of his story, he forgot he was speaking to a Protestant.

A visit to an island lake in Glen Veagh, where there was a manufactory of poteen in constant operation, is too true to nature to be agreeable; but this picturesque glen contains something better; and if the Joyce country boasts of its Big Jack Joyce, the mountains of Donegal and Glen Veagh, may well, in Jack M'Swine, brag of a still finer specimen of the true Irish rural gentleman of the olden time.

I cannot take leave of Glen Veagh, without calling to mind a visit we paid to a characteristic dweller of this singular and solitary scene. In a sunny nook, where a dark deep ravine expanded itself into a little grassy valley, affording room for a potato garden and a small meadow, and beside a small garrulous brook, rose a cabin—I dare not call it a cottage, for that supposes comfort, and associates cleanliness, neatness, the woodbine bower, the rose-covered lattice, with its idea—and such a spot on Ulleswater or Windermere would have been blessed and beautified with these accompaniments; but here we had no such amenities—the grunt of a starving sow, the growl of a gaunt greyhound, were the sounds that accosted us as we bent our heads to enter the narrow aperture that served almost as much for a chimney as an entrance. But when you entered, things bore a somewhat more satisfactory appearance; there was better furniture than is generally to be seen in an Irish cabin; some old-fashioned, high-backed chairs, some old carved, oaken, brass-mounted chests; a decent dresser, on which were ranged some pewter dishes and plates; implements of fishing were suspended along the walls, and a long French musket, its barrel mounted with brass, hung right over the immense mantel-piece of the chimney that jutted out almost into the centre of the apartment; above the gun was on old mezzotint print of the Holy Family, after Raphael, and over that again an old armorial bearing, on which you could observe a salmon, a lion passant, and a bloody hand, all well smoked. Beneath the canopy of the immense chimney, and beside the hob, in a comfortable high-backed chair, made of straw in the manner of a bee-hive, sat Jack M'Swine, the master of the mansion. He rose apparently with pain as we entered. I thought he would never cease rising, so slowly did he unbend his extraordinary height, and with apparent difficulty, as suffering under rheumatic pains, he advanced to meet my friend, whom he accosted with all the ease of an old gentleman, and all the cordiality of an ancient Irishman. All the lower classes of Irish are particularly civil and attentive to you when you enter their houses; I never in any of the provinces entered under a poor man's roof that I was not received with the smile of pleasure and the language of benignity, the best seat wiped, and offered for my acceptance, the pig expelled, the dog punished if he dared to growl at my entering. But here was even something better than this, for there was the Irish heartiness adorned with the urbanity of a gentleman; if he were the lord of a palace he could not have received us with more kind and unembarrassed courtesy, than did this dweller of the lonely mountain hut; and when I was introduced to him as one who had come from Dublin to see and admire the beauties of Glen Veagh, nothing could exceed the anxious kindness with which he expressed his desire to do everything to further my views; he lamented he had not a boat; that his fowling convenience and fishing tackle were not in trim for our use: in short, he seemed to feel a double pang that he was a poor man. But who was Jack M'Swine? The lineal descendant of the ancient sept of the M'Swines, who, next and only inferior to the O'Donnells, possessed a large portion of Tyrconnel. Our friend of Glen Veagh maintained that he was the M'Swine na Doo—the Caunnny or head of the family—and surrounded by poverty as we saw him, the dweller of the wretched hut, without one shilling of income, with nothing to live on but the produce of his potato garden, and the milk of a few cows that ranged the mountains, yet Philip the Second of Spain, ruling over dominions on which the sun never set, was not prouder in his bearing, or richer in the recollections of his Austrian ancestry, than this fading shadow of an Irish Tanist. The man literally lived, moved, and had his being as dependent on his family associations; and still life was only supportable under the one hope which he cherished. Amidst chilling discouragements, insurmountable obstacles, and endless rebuffs, he had now come to the verge of the grave; gray he stood and tempest worn, like one of the withering oaks on the side of Glen Veagh, and still he put forth the leaf and struggled for existence, hoping against hope. The M'Swines, as proprietors of a large portion of the mountain district of Donegal, had usually sided with the O'Neills against the O'Donnells; and O'Neill's demand of sixty cows as tribute from O'Donnell, was often enforced by the assistance of M'Swine; and when James I. conquered the O'Donnells, and escheated their lands, as a reward to M'Swine for his opposition to this chieftain, his mountains, perhaps because not worth confiscating, were left to him in peace; and in the following reign of Charles, when the execrable rebellion of 1641 broke out, the M'Swine, for some reason, did not join in it. There was no proof of massacre or murder against him, and the act of Settlement left him his property as an innocent Papist. Here then, down to the present century, the M'Swines lived, the lords paramount of these glens and mountains, in barbarous and profuse hospitality—here, surrounded by followers and retainers, amidst fosterers and coherers, their hall full of horse-boys, and dog-boys, and cow-boys—all idlers, all gentlemen; all disdaining any trade or occupation—fishing, fowling, hunting, or fighting by day; feasting, quarrelling, and carousing by night—thus the M'Swines, from father to son, lived: borrowing money, and mortgaging one mountain tract or line of sea coast after another. This is the common history of an Irish Castle-Rackrent family, and thus the common fate of the Sir Thadys and Sir Condys of Ireland attended the M'Swines, and our poor friend Jack came into the world the inheritor of his forefathers' name, pride, recollections, and imprudences; but alas! his lands had all vanished, and become, under foreclosed mortgages, the properties of families who possessed the low-born English and Scotch propensity of foresight and frugality; and still Jack M'Swine clung to the hope and expectation of recovering some of his alienated lands; he told us how certain tracts were illegally conveyed away from him by his father, and he besought me with all the anxiety of a man who was catching at vague impossibilities, that I would search the records in Dublin Castle for him, and make out his title. No one could possibly have seen this fine old man, so tall, so meagre, and yet so decent in his coarse attire, and so urbane and so gracious in the old-fashioned manner of the last century, without wishing that some portion of the wide domains of his ancestors was restored to him, and that his gray hairs might descend in decency to the grave; or rather, it would better become my desire and my prayer to turn these immoderate hopes, those ceaseless anxieties from such unreal fancies, from these fallacies of earthly ambition, to seek a property in a better country. . . . Every year this hearty old Milesian comes down from his mountain glen, and spends a day at the hospitable glebe-house of my friend, and he regularly brings to the younger part of the family an appropriate present; a gift which, from the remotest times, a king might accept, and a noble might bestow—a young eagle or jerr-falcon of the true hunting breed, from the cliffs of Glen Veagh. Before I left the country, this genuine gentleman brought me such a present, as a grateful recompense (the only one he could bestow) for the hearty interest and attention which I, as he said, condescended to take in the fallen fortunes of poor John M'Swine.

Of all the "strong" or "thick" bloods in Ireland, none is thicker or more fiery and proud than that which fills the veins of the numerous decayed scions of the royal race of the "O'Sullivans." An old gentleman, who lived near Ardghill, is our author's authority for the following capital illustration of a sort of pride by no means peculiar to Ireland. We have seen it equally rampant, and nearly as ridiculous, in certain parts of our own country.

When new roads were forming near Bearhaven, the old gentleman, who tells the tale, happened to pass by a small party of labourers, just at their dinner hour—all were sitting sociably together, consuming their humble but warm meal, which their wives and families had brought—but one was sitting apart and alone disconsolate on a rock.

"How comes it, my honest fellow, that you are not as well provided as your neighbours, have you no wife to bring you your dinner?"

"Troth, then, it is I that have a wife, and that's the case as why my dinner is not after coming."

"O poor woman! I suppose she is lying in, or she is sick?"

"Arra masha, not at all, your Honour; troth she is neither sick, nor sore, nor sorry—I'll be bound, master, she is as big and as brave a body as any man's wife from Bear to Bantry; but I'll tell you, master, what's the matter—she's a lady."

"A lady—why, what do you mean by a lady?"

"Arra now don't you know—sure, she's of the thick blood, she comes of the O'Sullivans."

"Well, but lady as she is, the O'Sullivans must eat—she's not above dining—she has mouth and teeth like other people."

"Oh! then it is she that has. At—och, then, let Biddy O'Sullivan alone for that; a better man than ever I was, she would ate out of house and home; and then, sir, she would break the bank in drinking tay. But though, sir, she will ate dinner with me—aye, and after me—she is not the one to bring it to a poor body that's after working all the day—that would be bringing down her quality stomach too much, your honour—by this pipe I hold in my fist, she would as soon carry Sugar Loaf on her head, or Hungry Hill in her hand, as bring me (and I have been a good man to her) my dinner."

"This is a strange story, friend."

"Strange is it?—why it's as true as you are there."

"Well, but if she don't work or go abroad, she is surely a good wife at home—she knits your stockings, she mends, she makes for you."

"Och, the sorrow one stitch—knit my stockings, wash, mend, make, for me! May I never sit under Father Mahony's knee, or ever see mass, if one hole in my stockings she ever darned, or even one needful of thread did she ever fill in mending or making for me."

"It would appear, then, that you have a heavy bargain of this lady-wife of yours."

"Why, what signifies complaining? sure she's mine, and it's the will of God, and that's enough. But barkee, your honour, (and here the poor fellow lowered his voice to a whisper, and inclined his head towards my ear, lest any of the royal O'Sullivans should overhear,) by the powers, if it were to be done over again, I'd sooner go on board a man-of-war, and live under a cat-o'-nine-tails, than be married to a LADY."

Though his Reverence is desperately anti-Catholic and anti-Whiggish, his genuine patriotism and kindness of heart keep him right upon many important points. The Marquis of Lansdowne and Trinity College, Dublin, have each immense estates in Kerry; those of the Marquis having been granted to his ancestor on the express condition of "keeping out" or rather expelling the Tories, and planting the country with good Protestants, as every old Whig might be supposed right willing to do. The respective properties of the Whig Peer and the Most Protestant University lie on opposite sides of the river. As our traveller drove slowly along, he observed—

That his Lordship's lands were much better cultivated; the farms better stocked; the cabins fewer; more grass land; what houses appeared were of a better description than on the Collegiate lands; and on alighting to walk up a hill, I entered into chat with a poor sickly-looking fellow, who was going towards Nedeem. There is no countryman in Ireland so easy, or I would say so polished in his address and manners as a Korryman. I was really surprised, as I passed through the country, to receive the swers and procure directions fraught with civility and intelligence, superior much to what I have met elsewhere. With the man in question I had a good deal of conversation, as he was going my road.

"Are you, my good friend, a tenant of Lord Lansdowne?"

"Ah, no, sir, and more is my loss. No, sir, if it were my luck to be under the great Marquis, I would not be the poor, naked, sinking crathur that I am. His Lordship allows his tenants to live and thrive—he permits no middlemen to set and re-set, over and over again, his estate—he allows no Jack of a Squireen to be riding in top-boots over the country, drinking and carousing on the profits of the ground, while the poor rackd tenant is forced, with all his labour, often to go barefooted, and often to live and work on a meal of dry potatoes. No, sir—look across the river there—look yonder at that snug farmer's house—there the man's forefathers lived, and there he himself and his seed after, will live and do well, paying a moderate rent, and there's no fear at all of their being disturbed."

"Well, but, my friend, on your side of the river, is it not the same?—to be sure I see not so much comfort, I see many, very many poor cabins."

"Oh, sir, how could it be otherwise? There are twenty landlords between the college and the man who tills the ground—the land is let, re-let, and sub-let—it is halved and quartered, divided and sub-divided, until the whole place will become a place of poverty and potato gardens. I have four acres of land: how can I live and rear my children, and pay thirty shillings an acre off that?—and I am subject to have my pig, or the bed from under me, canted by one, two, three, four—och, I do not know how many landlords—and now I am going to Nedeem, to get some physic from the 'poticary; for the dry potatoes, master, agree but poorly with my stomach in the spring of the year. Och, then, it's I that wishes that the great college, that does be making men so larned and so wise, would send down some of those larned people here, just to be after making their own poor tenants a little happier, and a little easier." I left this poor man uttering what I fear are unavailing regrets.

Now, we give Mr Otway infinite credit for these remarks, and commend this and all his books as among the most pleasant and good-humoured Irish Sketches of the day.

The Loving Ballad of Lord Bateman.

The lovers of romance, and of tales of heroic "true love," will not easily forgive Cruikshank for desecrating or profaning a fine, old, and favourite ballad, by his too—too clever illustrations. Parody and Travesty, whether perpetrated by pen or pencil, have, like Satire, their legitimate province; and, however it may fare with the young gentlemen vocalists who nightly perform in the Free and Easy Clubs or the Wine Vaults at Battle Bridge, the national ballad poetry, hallowed by time and affection, ought to be sacred to men of genius. Were two young persons, both familiar from childhood with the real ballad of Lord Beigham or Young Beckie—of which this illustrated ballad is a vile travesty—to see that travesty for the first time, the one with merely a gratified sense of the comic and exquisitely ludicrous, the other with disgust, which even the talents of Cruikshank could not conquer, we know of which youth's heart and intellect we should augur the most highly. A jury, of which Mr Wordsworth was the foreman, that should try this offence, would give it wholly against Cruikshank. Even Charles Lamb, with his strong love of sly fun, could not have pardoned this outrage. "Gilbert! Gilbert!" would have sounded in his ears, and true love and gentle courtesy have shamed the ribald parody. So, next time that he employs his facile pencil, we wish Mr Cruikshank, with equal felicity of illustration, a more becoming subject. Who could endure—to take not very dissimilar instances—to see "The Babes in the Wood," "Clerk Saunders," "Chevy Chase," or "The Dowie Dens of Yarrow," treated in this burlesque style?

Dangers and Evils of Modern Medical Quackery.

By Charles Cowan, M. D.

A better service to the public could not be performed by a professional man, than the exposure of medical quackery. In this pamphlet, something is done, though the field is not nearly exhausted. The recent very successful quack, St John, is instanced. His successor in public favour, according to Dr Cowan, is Morrison. Several cases of death, from the use of Morrison's Pills, are mentioned; and no fewer than three trials and convictions of his agents for manslaughter are recorded. One at York, one at Hull, and the case of Captain Mackenzie in London, are mentioned as having occurred between 1834 and 1836, besides several inquests held on persons who, it was found, had died from the use of Morrison's Pills. Dr Cowan remarks—"If the publicly-convicted instances are so numerous, the reader may imagine what the real fatality in Great Britain, and elsewhere, must have been." It is stated, from The Medical Gazette, that Salmon, the tobacconist, the accredited agent of Morrison, who was convicted of manslaughter for having dosed to death Captain Mackenzie with the Universal Medicine, afterwards split from his employer, upon the ground of the badness of the pills, which, he stated, were slovenly prepared, very carelessly mixed, and, consequently, of very unequal strength. He then united himself to Messrs Bygrave and Hall—the former Mr Morrison's footman, the latter a carpenter, accidentally employed in the premises of the great pill-maker—and, forming a coalition, in the most patriotic manner offers to supply the public with the only genuine Morrison's Pills! Pills more truly Morrisonian than Morrison's own!" An appendix describes the composition of the more popular patent medicines. Morrison's Pills are said to be compounded of gamboge, colocynth, aloes, squills, cream of tartar, and ginger—No. 2 containing three times as much gamboge as No. 1. "Those who take the largest doses, and persevere the longest in the use of the pills, reap the most benefit!"

Comstock's Natural Philosophy.

This work has been much admired among the practical teachers of Natural Philosophy in the United States; and Mr George Lees, a lecturer upon these subjects in Edinburgh, has considered the work of Dr Comstock worthy of being introduced into this country, from combining the two grand requisites in every elementary book—"simplicity and precision." He has recast some of the chapters, and added some important new ones.

Essays on Government.

These essays are the production of a man of liberal and sound, if not of very far-reaching or original views. But a good tale is not the worse of being twice nor ten times told; while a sober political sermon, to take effect, must, we apprehend, be preached over and over hundreds of times.

Todd's Students' Manual.

We have an idea that, on some previous occasion, we recommended this American re-print to the attention of our readers. It is a plain, sensible, and thoroughly practical treatise, written in a lively style, and pregnant with matter which is especially valuable to young men. This new edition is published in Lancaster, and at a very cheap rate.

Lepage's French Master for the Nursery.

Another work to facilitate to young children the acquisition of the French language. It is, however, as much a first class-book as a nursery volume. By the time that children begin to conjugate verbs, the era of asks has fairly commenced, and then adieu to the playful learning of the nursery. It then becomes labour in downright earnest to learn a foreign language; and, by the combination of vocabulary, lessons, and introduction to grammar, this little volume is well adapted to that object.

Every Lady her own Flower-Gardener. By Louisa Johnson.

A sensible and practical small compilation this, giving excellent plain directions for the management of the parterre, the small rural flower-garden, or suburban front-pot. It is well worth the attention of those, whether ladies or gentlemen, who, loving flowers, find it necessary to indulge their taste at little or no expense, save of that pleasant labour which should be named recreation. The authoress appears to have both a theoretical and personal acquaintance with floriculture. If some gardener would let ladies know whether the cleanly manure of bone dust be suitable for flowers, it would be useful. We fear they will not relish the compost recommended here.

Canada.

Mr Wright, the editor of the "Parliamentary History," has taken the trouble to arrange all the debates which took place in the House of Commons in the year 1774, about giving a constitution to the then newly-acquired provinces. Burke, then the agent for New York, was one of the principal speakers on the Liberal side. The compilation has great present interest, from the still unsettled state of these provinces. There is now, however, some probability that the British Parliament will be spared the trouble of giving them a Constitution, by their finding one for themselves.

Temptation; or a Wife's Perils. 3 vols.

This is a novel of great literary merit; but, we fear, that even a more canting preface than the author has found, will not save it from condemnation. The perils of the wife arise from the usual causes—marrying, as girls so often do, from the mingled motives of vanity, ambition, and the desire of obliging their wise relations; without love or respect for a husband who is not calculated to inspire either. The lovely heroine is, nevertheless, of that gentle, affectionate, devoted, and beautifully feminine nature, which more exposes an unattached wife to peril or Temptation, than if she possessed not one womanly or amiable quality. She is, after all, saved by a mere accident. The moral of the story ought to have been placed, not in her escape, but in the folly and danger of—without love, without esteem, without choice or preference—entering, for the term of life, into a relation which calls for the accordance of many tastes and feelings to place the contracting parties above the reach of "temptation and peril," by making their happiness depend upon their union. How true is it in every condition of existence, that if adversity has its uses, happiness is the kindest element of virtue; and that those who risk their happiness, as every unsuitably married man or woman must infallibly do, bring their virtue into manifest peril. We are not now going to enter into the question of the moral tendency of this novel, which, to say the least of it, is not bracing; but we may say emphatically, that here is the genuine utterance of passionate feeling. This is love that the tempted Helen feels; there is no mistaking its signs.

Alas, that what is so profound and so true should yet be lawless!

Campbell's Life of Mrs Siddons.

A cheap reprint of this pleasing piece of biography has appeared, without, so far as we have noticed, either addition or alteration. It is not a little surprising that none of the great critics have yet found out the gentlemanly ease and beautiful transparency of Mr Campbell's prose style. This memoir is another proof of what was sufficiently evident before.

Lord Leigh's Collected Poems.

After the good and graceful example of so many "pretty fellows in their day," Lord Leigh has here gathered together the poetic fancies and enthusiastic day-dreams of his youth, and the chastened, classical, and masculine effusions of his maturer years, and, with merely the addition of an exceedingly modest and unaffected preface, bestowed his literary legacy upon his countrymen. They will not fail to appreciate it as it merits. Lord Leigh has himself that warm appreciation of whatever is most elevating in English literature, and in the philosophy of poetry, which would make his own verses of value were it only from what they recall and reflect. There is great moral dignity in the graver of the epistles, and everywhere an expansive spirit of humanity. Glowing and cheerful views of social improvement are clothed in beautiful language; so that this lord is not a namby-pamby versifier, but "writes all like a man." The poem entitled the "Spirit of the Age," might have formed a graceful addition to our chapter of Radical poetry in our August No. Lord Leigh is a warm friend to the independence of Poland, to trampled Italy, and to the brave tribes of the Caucasus, now striving to the death against Russian arms, and Russian arts and gold, to maintain their rank as a free people. Finally, he is a Whig, and something more.

British Naval Biography.

A cheap useful compilation, giving an account of our naval heroes, from Howard to Codrington, in one well-filled small volume. It aims at doing justice to the merits and claims of every eminent sea-captain, and gives due importance, in its space, to the achievements of Nelson.

Smith's Standard Library.

Several good additions have been made to this handsome collection, both in prose and poetry. Among these is "The Autobiography of Benvenuto Cellini;" a rare work, certainly, though we should doubt of its extensive popularity in this country. One of the most valuable of these reprints, is Miss Sedgwick's pretty story of "Home"—one of the sweetest homely pictures of domestic life among the middle classes of New England which it is possible to imagine, and one full of the instruction which makes a way to the heart. How much happiness were ensured for themselves, and how much of whatever is most blessed conferred upon society, would our ambitious middle class govern their households and educate their children upon the principles of Mr and Mrs Barclay. "Humble, industrious, modest, quiet, neat"—refined in their feelings and manners, and simple and frugal in their living, the New England printer's family fully realize Wordsworth's ennobling household canon—

PLAIN LIVING AND HIGH THINKING.

The printer is a master in his trade; but his wife's only domestic help, with her large family, is the faithful Martha. A venerable mother-in-law, and a dependent maiden sister, form part of the family and of the elements in its moral and social operations. The girls of the family, are early trained to active, cleanly, and neat habits; and while they discharge every household office, have the manners of ladies, and receive an education much superior to that of those who conventionally receive the name.

Four Ways to Paris, and Paris itself.

A small hand-book, describing the customary routes from England to the French metropolis. Fully as much attention is paid to the cafés and restaurants as if the English went abroad only to taste French dishes and drink French wines. A few of the pages, filled with the ordinary tavern cartes and the list of wines, might be applied to some better purpose. There seems a great want of a respectable English eating-house in Paris, conducted like the best of those in London; and such an establishment would probably meet with ample encouragement.

The Rhine—Legends, Traditions, and History.

By Joseph Snowe, Esq. 2 vols. 8vo.

These two elegant volumes may be described as a kind of prose-epic, of which the Rhine is the grand theme, and which embraces an infinity of episodes. Thus, each town, village, church, and castle of the Rhine, is accompanied by its appropriate legend, and romantic or historical tradition; so that the most insatiable lover of this kind of lore—even Sir Walter Scott himself, were he alive to rejoice over the collection—might be satisfied at last. It affords a mine for the lovers and the compounders of romantic fiction, melo-dramas, and tales.

Letters from Germany and Belgium.

We need say the less of these entertaining sketches, as several of them appeared in this Magazine, a certain proof of our high opinion of their merits. They are now collected and improved, and form an exceedingly agreeable mélange littéraire.

An Analysis of a Hundred Voyages to India. By Henry Wise.

A book of tables and figures, interesting to all concerned in the improvement and spread of steam-navigation, and, in particular, to ship-owners and merchants: a pretty comprehensive list this. It will be understood that the work is not one for the idle reader, seeking only amusement; it has a specific and most important national object.

Magazine for the Blind.

Acting upon the discovery of raised or tangible letters, in which different small works have already been printed for the use of the blind, a Magazine has been projected for this interesting portion of society, the first Number of which is on our table. It appears in York. The excellence of its object must ensure this small publication universal good-will; so that, whether it be found successful or not, which the necessary expense makes doubtful, it is certainly deserving of a fair trial.

Memoirs of the Life and Labours of Robert Morrison, D.D. Compiled by his Widow.

The outline of the life of this Christian missionary and eminent Chinese scholar must be pretty generally familiar to the British public, which will be a preparative to the simple memoirs principally compiled from her husband's diaries and correspondence, which Mrs Morrison has laid before the world with affectionate simplicity. The perusal of the volumes leaves upon the reader's mind a highly favourable impression of the amiable and estimable personal character of their subject, and does away with the prejudice which some worthy persons have entertained against Dr Morrison for deserting his first post and accepting secular employment. If he ceased to act as a missionary, he never lost sight of missionary objects.

A New General Biographical Dictionary. By the late Rev. Hugh James Rose. Edited by the Rev. Henry J. Rose. Part I.

The particular feature of this new Dictionary is to give many names and dates in small bounds. Like all new compilations, it is meant to supply a want, and to be more complete and accurate than all that have gone before it in the same walk. We see no reason to doubt that it may fulfil those conditions, especially as, in every previous work of this description, there is abundant room for improvement.

The Book of the People.

A translation of the eloquent and philanthropic ravings of the Abbé de La Mennais has appeared in Glasgow. It is executed with accuracy and spirit.

Miss Roberts's Ten Minutes' Advice to the Outward-Bound.

This is a guide and advice-book to every one going to India, in whatever capacity, and one which is applicable to every variety of circumstance, from the Cadet, and the young lady "going out to her friends," with certain unwhispered ulterior expectations, to the Governor-General, his lady, and suite, proceeding to the East in state. The outfit, the comfort of the voyage, domestic economy, travelling, clothing, furnishing, cooking, care of health, useful information, and economical directions about ordinary affairs, and judicious counsel in matters affecting the more important interests of life, all find a place; and the book altogether we consider indispensable to an inexperienced individual going out to India, and useful to every one connected with that country.

A Summary of the Doctrines of the Papal and Protestant Churches. By William VEVERS.

The religious doctrines of the Roman Catholics do not appear to advantage in this brochure; but this we leave to the learned writers of the Dublin Review, if it be considered worthy of their attention. One specimen sufficed for us. A list of the price of pardons is first given from the Tax-book; as 10s. 6d. for a priest keeping a concubine, and £1 : 7s. for forging the Pope's hand; 7s. 6d. for a layman murdering a layman; £2 : 5s. for marrying in times prohibited, and so forth; and then it is gravely stated—"this tax-book has been asserted to be a forgery, but a defence of its genuineness is inserted in The Protestant Advocate!" A hull of indulgence, granted by Pius V. to the Jesuits in England, is, if authentic, more disgraceful to the policy of the Church of Rome than all the other enormities alleged.

JUVENILE BOOKS.

The Parents' Friend; or a Manual of Domestic Instruction. By John MORISON, D.D.

A sensible though somewhat commonplace discourse upon the training of children, and particularly upon their religious training. There is a chapter on making the Sabbath, that "day of weariness" to the poor children of many religious families, pleasant and profitable to them. This is a fit subject for consideration. The disgust and tedium which many children have experienced in what is called the proper observance of the Sabbath, has often, in after life, given them a distaste for whatever is associated with the Sabbath. Parents might, with great advantage read, on this subject, Chapter VI. of Miss Sedgewick's nouvellette, "Home," mentioned above.

Peter Parley's Geography of the Bible.

The title explains the nature of this little quarto. It contains some neat wood engravings and maps; and, to test the pupil's attention and knowledge, a string of questions are appended to each of the lessons into which the little Scriptural geography is divided.

The Village School; or Stories for Girls of Twelve years Old. By Mrs Leckie.

These are lively, clever, and entertaining stories; though somewhat over smart in style, we should imagine, for the simple tastes and earnest faith one loves in children. But what shall we say when caricatures and tales of slang are regularly provided, if not prescribed as the intellectual food of young minds. The stories before us are of a purer and better adapted character. Some of them are addressed to the imagination; others are directly instructive. The Peris of the West is a happy mixture of both; while the paper entitled Christmas Bills may be of use to the little girls of twelve years, when they come to be mistresses of families, or obtain the power of their own purses. The story, Christmas Bills, has the farther merit of dispensing with the necessity for any bills. It is Out of Debt out of Danger. We can see no use in Mrs Leckie making her machinery chime so very melancholiously at the close. Her heroine should have lived to exemplify in life the excellence and happy effects of her early training.

Ellen Mansfield.

This is a juvenile story, enforcing the importance of a strict adherence to truth as the best policy. The false girl shews more cunning than was needful to gain her object; but this, after all, is more a tale for parents than children. The child who lies, and plays false tricks to gain her own ends, is the neglected daughter of a weak and indolent mother, fond of pleasure; the truthful children have their habits strictly watched by an intelligent and affectionate mother. It is a tale for parents.

Tales of many Lands.

We have here a collection of very sweet tales for the entertainment of young persons. The intended instruction is not administered directly. It is such as, softening, purifies, and warms the heart.

SERIAL WORKS.

There would be no end to monthly notices of these multitudinous publications; so we reserve only the most laudable for detailed notice. Meanwhile, they are all, as the Americans say, progressing, whether grave or gay, flimsy or solid. The two "Shaksperes," the three "Lives of Wellington," the two "Memoirs of Napoleon," "Wordsworth's Greece, Pictorial, Descriptive, and Historical," "Ward's Library of Divinity" "Yarrell's Birds," "Jones' General Outline of the Animal Kingdom," and "Tyas's Heads of the People," with fifty others, are appearing as usual.

"Pictures of the French, drawn by themselves," in the style of "The Heads of the People," have been lately added to the number of serials; they are very clever and very French, and may help to give John Bull a truer idea of his neighbours than he has hitherto entertained. We begin to long, in these fictitious sketches, for the acquaintance of some one whose acquaintance is worth cultivating—some one whose superiority of character may impart the desire of becoming either better or wiser; we long for a little more of romance in short; something to purify or elevate the feelings. Parson Adams and the Vicar of Wakefield are quite as true to Nature as Scapin or Count Fathom, and how much more delightful!

POLITICAL REGISTER.

THE PROGRESS OF DESPOTISM IN BRITAIN.

THE ARMY.—While both the friends and the foes of the People proclaim the increase of the Democratic influence in Britain, they totally overlook or conceal the progress of Despotism. Ever since the breaking out of the first French Revolution, nearly half a century ago, whereby the upper and middle classes were "frightened from their propriety," to a degree from which they have never yet recovered, there is much reason to believe that the power of the Aristocracy, so far from diminishing, has been steadily on the increase; and there can be little doubt, we fear, that recent events, by again alarming the middle classes, is still farther augmenting that power. The Tory writers of the last century abound with doctrines and passages, which would now be considered downright Radicalism; and within the last forty years, shackles have been laid on the freedom of action, of the press, and even of speech, which were unknown to our ancestors. The Bill of Rights, which was presented to William III. in 1689, and afterwards made one of the statutes of the realm, declared that the raising or keeping on foot a standing army in time of peace, was illegal; but this declaration is a dead letter, for not only is such an army kept on foot from year to year, but its numbers are annually augmented without opposition from any quarter; and we have now three times the number of regular troops, within Britain, we had fifty years ago. During last century, the soldiers were employed in useful labours, such as making roads and building bridges, (of which labour the Highland roads and bridges are a specimen,) and, in this way, made some return for the expense of their maintenance; at present they are never employed in any public work whatever, and they are not even allowed to engage for short periods in the service of private individuals, as they used to be till within these twenty years; though constant labour is highly necessary for fitting a soldier for the fatigues and hardships of active service.

The constitutional doctrine of the last century was, that, "in a land of liberty, it is extremely dangerous to make a distinct order of the profession of arms; in free states, the profession of a soldier, taken singly and merely as a profession, is justly an object of jealousy. The laws, therefore, and constitution of this country, know no such state as that of a perpetual standing soldier, bred up to no other profession than that of war." "Nothing ought to be more guarded against in a free state than making the military power, when such a one is necessary to be kept on foot, a body too distinct from the People. Like ours, it should be wholly composed of natural subjects, it ought only to be enlisted for a short and limited time; the soldiers also should live integrated with the People; no separate camp, no barracks, no inland fortresses should be allowed. And perhaps it might be still better, if, by dismissing a stated number and enlisting others, at every renewal of their term, a circulation could be kept up between the army and the People, and the citizen and the soldier be more intimately connected together." These are the opinions of Blackstone, writing in 1765; but the note of his modern commentator breathes a very different spirit. "Experience has proved, that the most formidable enemy which the People of England have to dread, is their own lawless mobs. Care ought, therefore, to be taken, that soldiers may never become familiar with the People in great towns, lest these should be much more inclined to join them than to quell a riot." Here the doctrine is unequivocally avowed, that the use of soldiers is not to defend the country from foreign invasion—the only legitimate purpose for which they can be kept on foot—but "to quell riots," that is, to compel the masses to submit to the ruling oligarchy. The whole policy of the Government for many years has been to make the military a distinct body from the People, and to keep them from intermixing with them. Hence, upwards of 300 barracks have been erected in the United Kingdom; the troops are consequently shifted, from place to place, for the sole purpose of preventing "the citizen and soldier from being intimately connected together." The soldiers, both officers and privates, are led to consider themselves as superior to "civilians," of whatever rank; and hardly a week elapses without soldiers insulting or even wounding "civilians," in some part of the empire or other. Although, at present, we have no foreign troops in our service, we had many thousands in England during the late war, and they were found very useful in keeping the British regiments in order. Our readers will not have forgot the two years' imprisonment inflicted on Cobbett for denouncing the flogging of English soldiers at Ely, under the guard of some thousands of the German Legion. But although we have, at this moment, no foreign soldiers in Britain, our rulers do what they can to supply the defect. They keep Irish and English regiments in Scotland, Scotch and Irish in England, and English and Scotch in Ireland. They prevent the soldiers being employed in any public work, or entering into the service of individuals, lest they should intermingle with the citizens. So far from enlisting soldiers "for a short and limited time," they are enlisted generally for life, or, at least, as at present, for an indefinite period, which is practically the same thing: in short, in as far as regards the army, we fly directly in the face of every principle which our ancestors laid down as essential to the preservation of our civil liberties; and the rulers of the country for the last half century have, in all probability, done for Britain what Caius Marius did for Rome, who, by new modelling the republican legions, which consisted of citizens enrolled for a specific time, and by enlisting the rabble of Italy in the shape of a standing army, laid the foundation of all the military tyranny that ensued, and the erection of a Despotism on the ruins of the Republic. We even imitate a perhaps still more fatal policy of the later Romans. The Prætorian cohorts were constantly kept at Rome; and, in a short time, the empire was in their hands, enthroning and dethroning emperors at their pleasure. So do we also keep a favourite body of men in London—the Guards—with what result time will tell. Not content with our immense "standing army in time of peace," there have, of late years, been raised large bodies of yeomanry cavalry in almost every county, consisting of the tenantry and retainers of the Aristocracy. This oligarchical force amounted to 45,000 at one time, and many of them still continue embodied. No such force was ever heard of in this country before the first French Revolution. Farther, the militia has been said to be the boast of England:—"This is the barrier to which it looks for the preservation of its liberties; this is the defence which the Legislature itself has declared to be 'essentially necessary to its safety, peace, and prosperity.'"—30, Geo. II. (Gilbert Stuart.) Yet the militia—the old constitutional force of the kingdom, instituted by, and constantly kept up since the time of, Alfred—has been allowed to fall into abeyance, for the obvious reason, that, being chiefly composed of the lower classes, living, not "in barracks nor in fortresses," but intermingling with the People, and being the very sort of soldiers which our constitutional writers recommend, because a militiaman "puts not off the citizen when he enters the camp, but it is because he is a citizen, and wishes to continue so, that he makes himself a soldier," as Blackstone remarks: it is, we say, for these very reasons that the annual drilling of the militia has, of late years, been suspended, while a large proportion of the yeomanry—a force unknown to the country half a century ago—are kept, at a great expense, on foot. It was long after the Rebellion of 1745 before the militia were called out in Scotland, and, no doubt, for the same reason as has led to the suspension of their drilling of late years, because Government could not trust them. Add to the army and yeomanry the London police and rural police—an army in blue, destined in Britain, at no distant day, as it has long done in Ireland, to supersede the ancient conservators of the peace chosen by the People; and consider that all this force is under the command either of the Horse Guards, or of the Aristocracy, without the slightest control in the People—of which fact the refusal of Lord John Russell to withdraw the London police from Birmingham, at the request of the Mayor and Town Council, is pretty good evidence—and we will have some notion how our modern administrators of affairs have provided our Oligarchy—for it is ridiculous to call the Government of this country a Monarchy—with the ultima ratio regum—a physical force for the coercion of the People.

THE PRESS.—The freedom of the press has been much curtailed since the French Revolution of 1792. In 1798, a whole code of regulations was made regarding newspapers, laying their proprietors under various restrictions, and exposing them to numerous penalties. In 1819, Castlereagh imposed farther restrictions and penalties, and placed pamphlets, in many respects, under the same fetters as newspapers. In 1799, printers were placed under the surveillance of Government, and the possession of a printing press, or of printing types, without notice to the Government, was, for the first time, made penal, and the press itself made liable to seizure. At the same time, the affixing of the printer's name to every paper he printed, however inconsiderable, was also enjoined; and any person selling or circulating—that is, handing to another—a paper without the printer's name, though inadvertently, was rendered liable to a penalty of £20 for each copy so sold or circulated. The act, no doubt, very considerably limits the penalties recoverable, to 25 in all, or to £500—rather a serious punishment for distributing, as it might be, twenty-five copies of a shopkeeper's handbill. It was not till this session that this enactment has been in part modified. Type-founders were, by the same statute, brought under the surveillance of the justices of the peace; being bound to report to them their place of business, under severe penalties. In 1830, to prevent any but men of wealth or good credit establishing a newspaper or printing a pamphlet—but under the pretence of providing a fund, whence damages awarded for any libel might be recovered—the stamp-office was empowered to demand securities to the amount of £300 or £400, both from principal and sureties, from any one wishing to establish a newspaper. We are aware of cases where it has had the desired effect of preventing working men from establishing newspapers.

RESTRICTIONS ON FOOD have unquestionably existed in this country for centuries; but they never pressed with much severity on the body of the People till the last quarter of a century. During more than the half of the last century, we were exporters not importers of grain, and, during the war, the Corn-Laws, then in force, were, in a great degree, inoperative; because prices seldom fell so low as to call into action the high scale of duties. In 1813, however, the cry of agricultural distress began—be it observed, when wheat was 112s. a-quarter, and the quarter loaf at 1s. 6d.—and from that year to 1836, when the project was given up in despair, committees of both houses of parliament have constantly been sitting in order to discover the means of raising their own rents, though with the inevitable result of starving the People, whose affairs were entrusted to their selfish management. Farther, till 1814 or 1815, there was no law against the importation of fresh animal food, or live cattle, sheep, swine, &c., from abroad; but, as Cobbett tells us, such quantities of them were sent from France to England, immediately on the declaration of peace, and animal food fell so much in price in consequence, that Parliament, alarmed for the rent-rolls of the Aristocracy, took the short-hand process, not of imposing duties on the importation of fresh animal food, live cattle, &c., but of prohibiting them altogether. Perhaps this law is the most iniquitous and the most indefensible of any in the statute-book.

RIGHT TO POSSESS ARMS.—But there is another point which deserves attention. Both in England and Scotland, it was the ancient policy to inure every man in the kingdom to the use of arms. Numerous statutes are to be found in the statute-books of both countries, running through a space of two hundred years, regulating the sort of arms each different rank in society should possess; and even the inferior people, neither landowners nor burgesses who formed the horsemen and bowmen, were bound to appear "with battle-axe, target, sword, and dirk." At the same time, exercise in the use of arms was enforced under heavy penalties. The enforcing the regulations was a special duty imposed on the sheriff of each county. The Bill of Rights claimed expressly for the People the privilege of having arms for their defence suitable to their condition and degree; and this right was granted, in express terms, by one of the first statutes passed after the Revolution. It has never been attempted to be denied up to the present year. In Scotland, we have the most eminent authority on criminal law, and, at the same time, a bigoted Tory, and who was a party to the violent political persecutions which disgraced Scotland in the period 1794–1796, expressly declaring that—"As for the right of keeping arms in one's habitation, for one's own defence, this was never, at any period, called in question." Yet in Warwickshire and Lancashire, men's houses have been searched for arms; and, if any are found, they are not only seized, but the owners are carried to jail. Whether such proceedings are according to law, or against it, is immaterial; it equally proves the progress of despotism. If there is any such law, we have been unable to find it; but we know that, when an invasion was dreaded, in the beginning of George I.'s reign, an act of Parliament was thought necessary to disarm the adherents of the Stuarts; and that, at a later period, it was thought necessary to have similar authority for disarming the clan Gregor. We have said that our olden Governments, not only encouraged, but enforced, under severe penalties, military exercises, and a knowledge of the use of arms; but the going through military evolutions, or exercises, was, for the first time, declared by Castlereagh, in 1819, a heinous offence, punishable by transportation for seven years; and the Whigs have taken good care to let the enactment remain in the statute-book. We are the only nation in Europe, perhaps in the world—and this is a fact worthy of the most attentive consideration—which is afraid to entrust the body of the People with arms, and the only nation which has made the going through military evolutions a crime. Considering the revolution which steam-navigation has made in warfare, the narrowness of the sea which divides us from nations with which we have almost always been at war, the eagerness of, and the unscrupulous expedients resorted to by a powerful party in this country to embroil us with Russia, the ambition of that power, our deficiency in fortresses, and that our towns, even on the sea-coast, are defenceless, it deserves serious deliberation whether it is a politic course to disarm the People of defensive weapons, and to make any attempt to teach the knowledge of military exercises a transportable offence.

Against all these evidences of the increase, not of the power of the People, but of the Despotism of the Oligarchy—and we could have enumerated many others had our space permitted—what has the most voluble railer against Democracy to oppose? One single measure, the Reform Act. Now, how was it obtained? Simply by a system of delusion on the part of a section of the Aristocracy, who were tired by their long exclusion from place, power, and plunder. They induced the middle and working classes to believe that, of itself and without any further exertion, the Reform Act would speedily rectify all abuses. It was generally believed that, in a very few years after a Reform Parliament was elected, the Corn-Laws would be repealed, the Ballot and Triennial Parliaments obtained, Slavery abolished, (but not bought up at an expense of twenty millions to this country,) the Army reduced, the public expenditure, in all departments, diminished, and taxation lessened. Has anyone of these objects been attained? No. The Corn-Laws, or rather Rent Laws, remain untouched, the Army has been greatly augmented, and the public expenditure has been so much increased, that, instead of taking off old taxes, new ones must be imposed. The Reformed Parliament has shewn itself as despotic as its predecessors. It has coerced Ireland and Canada, thrown away the money of the People on all sorts of frivolity and extravagance; and hence, at the end of seven years of Reform, we find the country, as well as our most valuable colonies, in a state little short of rebellion; the revenue unequal to the expenditure, and the People starving. Not one of the objects which the People expected from the Reform Bill has been accomplished. All that has been got is the extension of the bare right of voting, to some hundreds of thousands of people who had it not before; and the privilege, if it can be so called, of exercising that right in such a manner, that it is a curse to a great proportion of those who have obtained it—the right of exercising it in such a way as secures the return of a House of Commons, little, if at all superior to that sent in the time of the rotten burghs, if, indeed, that time can be said to be past while so many of them still remain. The grown-up children have got their drum, but good care is taken that they shan't make a noise with it. We trust, therefore, we have shewn that the power of the Oligarchy has increased, is increasing, and ought to be diminished, if the remnant of our liberties be still thought worthy of an exertion for their preservation. The obtaining of the Reform Bill is no more a test of the increased power of the People, than the Revolution of 1688. Neither would have been got without the Aristocracy; and, withal, if James had not run off, and William had not unconstitutionally rendered his assistance, neither the Revolution nor the Reform Bill would, in all probability, have been carried through.

During the month, there have been numerous changes among the Ministry and their officials. Lord John Russell has resigned the Home Department, and exchanged with Lord Normanby for the Colonies. Mr Spring Rice has been created Baron Montagu of Brandon, in the county of Kerry, and Mr Francis Thornhill Baring has been appointed Chancellor of the Exchequer. Mr Labouchere has been made President, and Mr Sheil Vice-President of the Board of Trade; Mr Poulett Thomson Governor-General and Captain-General of all her Majesty's provinces on the continent of North America and Prince Edward's Island; and Mr Wyse a Lord of the Treasury.

Mr Baring was re-elected for Portsmouth, and Mr Wyse for Waterford, without opposition; Mr Robert Hyde Greg, an excellent Liberal and a Corn-Law repealer—exactly the sort of representative Manchester ought to have—defeated Sir George Murray at Manchester, by a small majority. On the other hand, Mr Manners Sutton, a Tory, has beaten Mr Gibson, the Liberal candidate, at Cambridge, by a majority of 100. Mr Gibson, who is a recent convert to Liberalism, will not be the worse of a few years probation. Mr David Greig, the Provost of Perth, defeating Mr Oliphant rather unexpectedly—it not having been known till a few hours before the election that he was a candidate—has been elected representative of that burgh. His political opinions do not appear to be at all of a decided character. Mr O'Connell has dissolved the Precursor Society, and again raised the cry of "Repeal," whether sincerely or not we cannot say; but the cry seems as popular as ever.

SCOTLAND.

THE SCOTTISH POOR.—A Committee of the General Assembly have prepared a Report on this subject. The poor are divided into three classes—permanent poor, occasional poor, and lunatics in confinement; and the result gives the average of the three years ending with 1837, inclusive. Of the 496 parishes in Scotland, quoad temporalia, returns have been obtained from 879. The population of these 879 parishes was 2,316,000, in 1831; and, according to the usual rate of increase, would be 2,446,000, in 1836. The number of the poor in the 879 parishes, on the average 1835-6-7, was—permanent poor, 57,969; occasional poor, 20,348; lunatic paupers, 1112; in all, 79,429. Among 1000 inhabitants, there were, of the first class, twenty-five; of the second, eight and three-fourths; of the third, one-half. The first class includes the number of their families dependant on them, the second class, only the individuals to whom payment is made. The proportion of the paupers to all classes of the population of 1831, was $3\frac{1}{4}$ per 1000, or nearly $3\frac{1}{4}$ per cent.; but, if compared with the population of 1836, it would be reduced to $3\frac{1}{4}$ per cent. It is difficult to compare this return with that of the ten years ending with 1816; for in that return the families of paupers receiving relief were not in general included in the number of poor. The former return shewed the average number of the ten years to be 44,199, in a population of 1,764,600, or $2\frac{1}{4}$ per cent.; but if an allowance be made for the families of those receiving relief, it will raise the per-centage to nearly the same amount as that given by the last return. The allowance given is exceedingly small, and this is no doubt the reason of there being so few paupers in Scotland.

The average annual rate of relief to each of the occasional poor is 14s. 8d., and the average annual rate of supporting each lunatic pauper in confinement is £10 : 12 : 4. The funds for the support of the poor are—

The second head comprehends gifts and bequests, and voluntary rateable contributions, which the heritors of some parishes raise among themselves to prevent a legal assessment. The third head includes mortifications, with certain dues on baptisms, funerals, and marriages. In the twenty-five years, 1811 to 1836, the population has increased 36 per cent., while the collections have only increased 12 per cent. The assessment has increased 55 per cent. In 1816, assessments existed in 192 parishes; there are now 238 assessed, of which 184 are in the Synods of the Merse, Tiviotdale, Lothian, and Tweeddale. Of the 879 parishes, there are 517 parishes not assessed; population, 872,626; 126 voluntarily assessed; population, 305,654; and 236 legally assessed; population, 1,137,646. The expense is as follows:—1. Levying assessments, £4,120; 2. In managing the poor, £2,968; 3. In litigation, £921; in all, £8,000. The rate of allowance in non-assessed parishes is £1 : 0 : 4½; in voluntarily assessed, £1 : 19 : 1½; in legally assessed, £2 : 14 : 9½. It does not appear that a legal provision for the poor increases their number, as is commonly said.

RAILWAY FROM EDINBURGH TO ENGLAND.—Several meetings have, of late, been held regarding the construction of a railway from Edinburgh to England, and two lines have been proposed—one by the east coast, and the other almost directly south, through the centre of the country, to join the Newcastle and Carlisle railway. In considering the most eligible line for a railway, two circumstances ought chiefly to be regarded—the ease with which it may be constructed, and the number of passengers likely to be obtained; for it is from passengers, almost entirely, that the expense of a railway can be repaid. There can be no doubt that the Eastern Line runs through the more populous district; and it will be found that nearly one-third more coaches travel by the coast than by the Middle Line. While the Middle Line passes through, or near, few towns or villages of importance, the East Line would pass through or within a few miles of the following:—Dalkeith, Portobello, Musselburgh, Prestonpans, Tranent, Haddington, Linton, Dunbar, Cockburnspath, Coldingham, Kyemouth, Aytoun, Berwick, Tweedmouth, Belford, Alnwick, Morpeth; having an aggregate population of upwards of 60,000. The Counties of Roxburgh, Selkirk, and Peebles, through which the Middle Line would pass, have, on the average, a population of forty to the square mile; Berwickshire and Haddingtonshire have an average of 122 to the square mile. The average rental of the three first counties, per square mile, or per 640 English acres, is £240—of the two latter, £739; so that the wealth, as well as population of the district, is in favour of the Eastern Line. We believe, also, that the Coast Line, as it passes through a more level country, could be formed at a much less expense than the Middle Line. This is a very important consideration in the present depressed state of railway shares; for there are very few of them, indeed, which are not under par. How Carterfell is to be passed, we have not seen explained. It was formerly proposed to make a tunnel through it; but as it would have been nearly three miles in length, and at a depth of 900 feet below the surface, we presume that plan has been given up as hopeless. We regret to see so much apathy and indifference, on the part of the landowners through whose estates the projected Eastern Line passes, regarding the matter. Whatever may have been the result to the subscribers, we believe there is not a single case in which the formation of a railroad did not benefit the lands through which it passed: it is therefore the interest of the landed proprietors to encourage such undertakings. But, instead of this, instances have occurred of their applying to Courts of Law to prohibit the preliminary surveys, without which no line can be fixed on. One of the objections made to the Eastern Line is, that it is unnecessary, as the conveyance by sea is open. But the decisive answer to this is, that although it has often been attempted, it has been found impracticable to obtain any considerable number of passengers from Newcastle to Leith, or the intermediate ports, by sailing vessels or steam-boats; and there is, therefore, no danger of any serious competition by such means. The difficulty of landing on so dangerous a coast must always greatly limit the number of passengers. Another objection to the Eastern Line is, that it cannot be connected with the Glasgow Railway, which, by the present Act, is to terminate at the Hay Market. But we doubt not that, sooner or later, the consent of the proprietors of Prince's Street Gardens will be obtained, to continue it to the Little Mound; and there is no difficulty in bringing the Eastern Line to the same terminus. And, even should the Prince's Street proprietors continue their opposition, there is another and perhaps a preferable mode of continuing the Glasgow Railway to the Little Mound. From the Hay Market to the Corn Market, at the west end of the Grassmarket, is about three-quarters of a mile. A sufficient space of ground, along the whole distance, for a double railway, is either unoccupied with buildings, or the buildings are of the most ruinous or shabby description. The general line of the railway might be by the south side of Morrison Street or Torphichen Street, then through Dewar Place, taking down one or two houses of small value; through the garden ground on the south side of the West Church Charity Workhouse, the Lothian Road being carried over the railway by a viaduct bridge; thence through the unoccupied ground at the north back of Orchardfield and Portsburgh, and through the old tenements at King's Stables to the Corn Market. Here there might be a small depot for passengers and goods. In this way the railway would be brought to a central part of the Old Town, and it would thereby ensure the transport of the whole grain from the west country to Edinburgh; whereas it is doubtful how far farmers would be disposed to send their grain to market by the railway, when it had all to be unloaded at the terminus at the Hay Market, reloaded, and carted nearly a mile to the market. The small quantity of grain conveyed by the Dalkeith Railway unquestionably arises from each terminus being about a mile distant from the market place. No difficulty will be found from the levels, as that of the Hay Market and the Corn Market are nearly the same; and the ground rises so much in the intermediate space, that there will be sufficient depth to carry the Lothian Road over the railroad by a viaduct. From the Corn Market to the south-western corner of the eastern Prince's Street Gardens, the distance, in a straight line, as appears from Kirkwood's map, is hardly 1200 feet; and by running a short way up the north side of the Grassmarket, the distance is lessened; at the foot of the Bow it is only 800 feet. We would make a tunnel through the High Street from the Grassmarket to the Gardens. This tunnel, even though 1200 feet long, would be much shorter than that of the Dalkeith Railway in the King's Park, which is 1728 feet—not more than one-third of the proposed tunnel on the Newhaven Railway from Canonmills to the Little Mound—not one-fourth of the largest proposed on the Glasgow and Edinburgh Railway—and not double the length of that which would require to be made under the Mound, were the Glasgow Railway to be continued through the Prince's Street Gardens. The tunnel from the Grassmarket to the Gardens could be constructed much more cheaply than the last mentioned, as it would probably not be required to be arched, except for a short way at each end; whereas that through the Mound would require to be arched throughout. In this manner the terminus of the Glasgow and Edinburgh—Newhaven, Leith, and Edinburgh—and Newcastle and Edinburgh Railways, would be all at one place; an advantage which it is impossible to attain, if the Middle Line to England be adopted. It is evident, that the bringing of all these railways into the centre of the city, would secure to Edinburgh an immense traffic; whereas if the present plan of making the terminus of the Glasgow Railway at the Hay Market, with a branch from Coltbridge to Granton Pier, be carried into effect, a great part of the passengers and goods from the west country to England, and vice versa, will never pass through Edinburgh at all. We believe the plan we have proposed is perfectly practicable, and recommend it to the notice of the proprietors and projectors of the railways.

THE NEW SEQUESTRATION ACT has now come into operation, and it will be found to contain a great many improvements on the old law. Formerly there was always a great risk in ranking on a sequestrated estate, as, not unfrequently, instead of receiving a dividend, the creditor had to pay the expenses of the sequestration; but this abuse is remedied by the new act, which confines the agent's claims to his employer and the estate. The terms for the payment of the dividends are greatly shortened. The working of the machinery of the act is greatly simplified, and the expense much reduced. In the "Manual of the Law of Scotland, Civil, Municipal, Criminal, and Ecclesiastical," by Mr Burton, advocate, just published, will be found an excellent abridgement of this statute. The Manual also contains an immense body of well digested information, on a great number of subjects of general interest; and as technical expressions are as much as possible avoided, it will be found exceedingly useful to persons unacquainted with the law; while, at the same time, from the care which has evidently been bestowed on it, and the constant and numerous references to authorities, the Manual cannot fail to be very serviceable to the profession, especially to persons who are not possessed of a good collection of law books. Our space does not permit us to enumerate the great variety of subjects treated of, but a glance at the table of contents will prove that a larger quantity of information has been condensed into this volume than would have been considered practicable. We can therefore, without hesitation, strongly recommend it to our readers.

TRADE AND MANUFACTURES.

The accounts from the manufacturing districts are by no means favourable. One of the most extensive weaving establishments in Glasgow has commenced to work short time, the workers being employed only four days in the week. In the west of England the state of the weather, and the scarcity of money, has almost entirely paralyzed trade. The accounts from America have also been unfavourable, which has tended still farther to depress the markets. The price of provisions, particularly of wheat, are steadily rising, while the wages of the operatives have of late years been diminishing. In many districts in England the hands are only employed three days in the week; and, even when they are working full time, they hardly earn more than one-half the wages they received a few years ago. The manufacturers' list of prices for their goods have remained nearly the same for ten years, and the competition that takes place among them is in the per-centage allowed the purchasers. While the nominal price remains the same, their profits have gone on diminishing. In some trades the deduction has progressed from 15 to 25, and even so high as 75 per cent. The great cause of this evil is the Corn-Laws, which have set up rival manufacturing establishments in every part of the world. In the New York market, twenty-five years ago, "domestic hardware" was hardly to be seen; but, in 1836, seven millions of dollars' worth were sold in that market, nearly the whole of which had formerly been imported from England.

AGRICULTURE.

The weather in September has been very unfavourable for harvest operations, and a very small proportion of the grain crop in Scotland was secured during the first three weeks of that month. The grain which is uncut has been completely beaten down, and must have suffered severely; and that which is in the stook has, in many instances, begun to spring. The samples of wheat which have appeared at Mark Lane are of a very indifferent quality; and it is expected that the price which regulates the duty will be considerably lowered by the operation of the low-conditioned grain in the market. Large quantities of foreign wheat have, in consequence, been taken out of the market at a duty of 6s. 8d. The home-grown grain of last crop is believed to be nearly exhausted, but the quantity of foreign grain in bond is as great as ever, and importations to a large amount during the autumn are expected. The high price of grain is, perhaps, not to be regretted, as it will keep the Corn-Law agitation from slumbering; and as the working classes must now have had practical experience of the fallacy of the notion so confidently held out to them, that wages rise as prices rise, we think it not unlikely that they will join the middle classes in their efforts for a repeal.

At the second Falkirk Tryst there was a smaller shew than usual; about 30,000 sheep, and the same number of black cattle. Prices of sheep were at least ten per cent. above those of last year. The demand for black cattle was brisk, and all were sold the first day.

THE EGLINTON TOURNAMENT.

"THE Tournament !—the Tournament !—the Tournament at Eglinton Castle !" were the words which came continually dropping upon our ears in all societies, like the popping shots from detached bush-fighting sharpshooters ; and this, from the moment that the original conception of the grand spectacle was first promulgated, up to the period of its being fairly carried into execution. The expectation of the whole world was on tiptoe—the curiosity, as well as the hopes of people of all ranks, conditions, and ages, were raised to the highest pitch ; and the interchange of questions, and speculations on the subject, became louder and more incessant the nearer the time approached. We scarcely ever remember any coming event, which—casting, not its shadow, but its sunshine before it—so much occupied the minds of men ; and, still more, perhaps, the minds of women also. Here we may be allowed to interject, somewhat parenthetically, that, as the sunshine preceded the event, it most unfortunately seemed to consider it as a matter of etiquette that it should also depart as much as possible before its arrival. But, however this may have been, we ourselves must honestly acknowledge, that, having been all our lives brimful of the finest racy-flavoured ancient romance, which we hold to be a sort of gaseous product, somewhat analogous to the well-known paradisaical gas, we could not help feeling our full share of that anxious eagerness that so largely possessed the multitude on this occasion. Highly charged, indeed, as we previously were with romantigen, it is no wonder that we perhaps felt this anxious eagerness in a degree of abundance which might have furnished a fair enough allowance of it to each individual of any fifteen other persons, if what fell on our shoulders had been fairly divided among them, share and share alike. Never, therefore, did we before, perhaps, so appropriately unite in the important first person plural we of the present. But, with all this our zeal for ancient doings, we do not hold ourselves to be, on this account, one whit the worse judges of the merits of the Eglinton Tournament ; on the contrary, we are satisfied, that We Fifteen do form a jury of persons so intelligent, so well educated, and, above all, so learned in the ancient customs of chivalry, as to be altogether better calculated to decide upon the success or the failure of this Gentle Passage of Arms at Eglinton, than any other body of men of the same number, out of all the one hundred, if not two hundred thousand persons, who were said to have been present. And this we do most modestly assert without fear, or, at least, without care of contradiction. We were not among those unreasonable people, who, from having seen or heard of some of those preliminary practisinga which took place at St John's Wood, near London, were disposed to ridicule the whole attempt, because of certain little blunders which may have taken place there. We knew well enough that, as the old proverb sayeth, "Practice maketh perfect." And we were well aware that, if the rehearsal of the most admirably performed play, concert, opera, or oratorio, had been previously attended by those whom the excellence of its final execution has afterwards wrapped up in enthusiastic admiration, they might have laughed in ridicule, or winced with pain, at the performance of those very people who, by continued practice, have at last succeeded in so much delighting them. We were, therefore, readily disposed to set it down as a truth, that those who, prematurely judging from such early efforts at St John's Wood, were led to augur unfavourably of what was subsequently to take place at Eglinton Castle, were "Fools," who, in the language of another proverb, "should never see a half-finished work." They might just as rationally have prognosticated of the babe whom they saw making his first attempt to totter across the floor, that he never could be able to ply his pins as a pedestrian ; or of the downy eaglet of the aerie, that he should never have the power of mounting heavenward to meet the sun. On this head, all we have to say is, that we think the good-nature and courtesy of the Earl of Eglinton, and his noble and gallant knights-companions, were stretched to an unnecessary extent; and that they were very much thrown away, in suffering the admittance of any portion of those who may be called the foolish and impertinent of the public, to be present at all at any of those preliminary jousting trials, where ignorance and arrogance were so sure to manifest themselves, at first, in the wicked wantonness of premature criticism; and afterwards, by uncharitably employing themselves in abusing the minds of others, by the dissemination of their unfair reports. With us, however, as we have already said, their ill-omened croakings had no effect. We disregarded them all, and waited patiently, yet with great eagerness of expectation, like wise men, until we should have it in our power to judge of the finished work on the appointed day.

Having received an elegantly designed card, of large dimensions, with a most appropriate Gothic frame-work represented thereon, supporting the arms of Eglinton, and containing this invitation engraved in black-letter characters—"The Earl of Eglinton requests the pleasure of _____'s company at the Tournament, Banquet, and Ball, at Eglinton Castle, the 28th and 29th August;" and having engaged ourselves, about that time, to a friend whose ample estates are some dozen of miles or so from the town of Ayr; we left our home, with a merry friend, one fine morning, a few days previous to that fixed for the commencement of the Tournament, in order to take our departure by the coach for that town. Arriving at the office in Prince's Street a little before the hour at which it should have started, we were astonished at the immense pile of luggage which we saw heaped on the street in order to be packed upon the carriage. When Mr Croal, the coach-proprietor, came up, he was so much appalled by the sight, that, apologizing for the delay which he must inevitably occasion, he informed us that he must send back the coach to the yard, and get out a stronger one, that might be more certainly able to bear such a load without risk of breaking down. When this more potent vehicle arrived, any impatience that might have been excited in us by the delay, was subdued by the interest which we could not help taking in the ingenuity which the coachman and his assistants displayed in packing and piling the various articles in and upon it; till I, and my companion, and two officers of our acquaintance, who had all of us placed ourselves comfortably on the hinder seats, could no longer see those in front, even when we stood up to try to do so. We felt some comfort in thinking that the superior construction of coaches, now-a-days, admits of this being done with more safety than was formerly the case. Besides all the ordinary kinds of trunks, portmanteaus, band-boxes, and carpet-bags, which are usually attendant upon a coach full of passengers inside and outside, there were innumerable white deal boxes of all manner of shapes and sizes. Most of these were ingeniously suspended like sausages, on strings all around the carriage; and, to crown all, on the very top was perched a wicker cage, containing a great, long-legged, large-bodied, awkward-looking pair of Chittagong fowls, belonging to a curried Indian who had a seat in the interior. The cock not only seemed to know that he was going to the Tournament as well as other people, but to think that he was to be triumphant there; for, much to the amusement of all who beheld him, and especially to the great entertainment of the idlers who were looking on in the street, he crowed away so loudly that he brought some of the sleepy citizens of Prince's Street, in their night-caps, from their beds to their windows, to wonder at so unwonted a summons. Such was the appearance of the coach after its packing was completed, that no one could have well guessed that it really was any such four-wheeled vehicle, if he had seen it creeping along the road thus burdened and smothered up.

At length we found ourselves in motion, and we began to beguile the way with chat and cigars. Our facetious friend, who had lately lost two valuable silk umbrellas, by their having been stolen from him one after the other, had been just boasting to us of a bran new cotton one which he had bought, on the principle that no one would think anything so common worth the purloining. This umbrella he had laid down on the uppermost box of a string of those that hung behind the back seat, and were thus most marvellously built downwards till they nearly touched the road. As we were journeying on, one of the officers began to snuff up his nose, and to wonder where the smell of burning and of smoke was proceeding from. We all became immediately sensible of it. The alarm spread among us, when, suddenly, the other officer, who sat with his face to the rear, roared out to our friend—"Good heavens, sir, your umbrella is on fire!"—and there, to be sure, it was, blazing up like a volcano, not only to the manifest peril of the box on which it lay, and on which the fire had already caught hold, but of all the boxes of the string, yea, even to the risk of the coach itself. The confusion and the bustle amongst us of the rearward of the coach, to get the fire extinguished, was indescribable. One gentleman, who we believe to have been a bailie of a town, or in some way connected with the police, began to vociferate loudly for the fire-engines; whilst another, whom, we have reason to think, was a reporter, took out his pen, paper, and ink-horn, and began, with the philosophy of a stoic, to note down the circumstances attending the progress of the conflagration, altogether forgetful that, if it went on, he and his record must perish together. The fowls, who looked down upon us, fluttered and screamed, and more than one of us shouted; but the intervening pile of _____ the roof, which left us as "Britannos toto orbe divisos," together with the noise of the coach, shut out both the scene and the cries from those who were sitting in front, unconscious of our danger. At last, after various ineffectual attempts to extinguish the flames, our friend betought himself of rubbing the blazing umbrella against the wet wheel; and he thus most fortunately succeeded in subduing the conflagration, but not until the deal box on which the umbrella had lain had been nearly burned through, nor until each section of the parapluie itself displayed a huge square window between the whalebone spars, that gave it the most ludicrous effect. After thanking our stars that we had not been all consumed, and thinking how much surprise the coachman, and those with him, would have manifested on arriving at the next stage, if they had found that the tail of the coach, and all upon it, had been burned off, we began to inquire into the cause, and found that the accident must have been owing to a stray piece of ignited German tinder having found its way into the folds of the umbrella. The adventure, then, furnished us with much merriment at the expense of our friend's parapluie; and when an occasional shower compelled him to hoist the strange uncouth-looking instrument, it furnished no less entertainment to the population of the different villages we passed through, where every one had turned out to look at the various coaches and carriages that were, even thus long before the day fixed, passing through, laden with guests bound to the Tournament.

We had no sooner got fairly into Ayrshire, than we became much interested in the many pretty young persons whom we found anxiously waiting by the wayside for the coming up of the coach. We do not mean those nice-looking servant girls who are generally pretty numerously planted at the different hedge inns and half-way houses, who come out, conscious of the power of their own charms, with what we call in Scotland—and our Scottish poet, Allan Ramsay, too, calls—"a thieveless errant," that is, Anglicé, a pretended errand, to inquire for some parcel, which "the mistress," either truly or falsely, did or did not expect; and all this for the purpose of having a leer or a joke with the coachman, or with any pleasant fellow of an outside, who may be disposed to enjoy a fractional part of half a minute's small flirtation with her. No! We mean something very different from all this: we mean handsome, well-dressed young ladies, married and spinsters, who, all along of the Tournament, were found by the wayside—some on foot, and others in carriages—some attended by husbands, some by fathers, and some by brothers—and who were anxiously waiting at the lodge or gate of every gentleman's seat we passed, and at the embouchures of many of the by-roads which led to gentlemen's seats, and who all of them opened in succession, as the coach drove up towards them, in eager and clamorous inquiries after their boxes.

"Oh, coachman! coachman! have you a box from Mr Blackwood's for me?" cried one.

"Coachman! coachman! my box from Madame Meyer!" cried another.

"Haven't you a box from Madame Devy for me?" modestly vociferated a third.

"You've got a box from MacLennan & Sproat, have you not?" shouted another.

"Mademoiselle Cercleron's box, addressed to me, coachman," authoritatively demanded another.

"A box from Miss Wotherspoon for the two Misses——? I'm sure you have it, coachman," lisped out two sisters at once, each with a great emphasis on the word sure. Whilst the brother, a manifest dandy, twirled a pair of moustachoes, and said—"I say, coachee, have the goodness to hand downe my box from the Albion Cloth Company—it is of the last impoortance."

"No sitch boxes here!" replied coachee.

The exclamations of the two ladies and the gentleman being in Soprano, contre-alto, and a sort of a kind of bass, made what musicians would call a splendid crash. It is beyond the power of mere types, without the aid of musical notes, to give any idea of it. But before we could well catch the tune, coachee was off. The coach appeared to us to be a sort of lottery-wheel so far as these good people were concerned; some were sent home from it filled with wretched disappointment and despair, and we imagined the dreadful night they were doomed to spend; whilst others, who had all the luck, were rendered supremely blessed by the arrival of their boxes, and could so little contain their joy, that they clapped their hands and danced upon the very road; and we thought that we saw among them some, whose impatience seemed to be so great, that we doubted not they would stop, ere they were half way up the avenue, to open the precious box, that they might have one peep, en passant, at the splendid fancy dress which it contained.

The bustle in Kilmarnock and Ayr, even on this early day, was very great. People seemed to have crowded into these towns to secure lodgings, or to try to supply some deficiencies of dress which arose from forgetfulness, or perhaps were the fruits of more matured thought. The clamour for boxes in both towns was immense; and largely as the coach was loaded with them, it passed our comprehension, great as it is, to understand how so many of the claimants were supplied. A very handsome woman, indeed, was the owner of the box that had so narrowly escaped the jaws of the devouring element. Admiring her, as we must confess we did, we hung down our heads like culprits when we saw the box handed into her carriage. But her thoughts were manifestly more employed in fancying the fancy dress which it contained, than in regarding the effects of the ravages of the fire upon the lid; and she drove off with smiles upon her beautiful countenance, carrying with her our two military friends, who were to be her husband's guests. The crowds of gay equipages and figures which were moving about in the streets, and driving along the roads, gave sufficient promise of what might be expected when the great day of the Tournament should actually come. For our parts, after our arrival at Dun's Inn, at Ayr, a post-chaise, long ago bespoke for us, whirled us away from amidst all this noise and scramble, to comfort and quietness under the hospitable roof of our friend.

We have been thus particular as to the small events of our journey, because we conceive that our readers, who had not the happiness of being at the Tournament, may best gather some notion of the hurry, bustle, and excitement that preceded it, and that oppressed all the steamers, carriages, and coaches, upon all the roads, that led from all quarters of the three kingdoms, towards the great centre of attraction—the Tournament at Eglinton Castle—from this small and isolated specimen of what occurred to ourselves on our journey thither, so many days previous to the great spectacle. Ex pede Herculem—which being translated for the unlearned, may be well enough rendered for our present purpose—from our adventures and perils in the Ayr coach, judge of the vast sum, the "total of the wholl" sum of adventures and perils which must have befallen the one or two hundred thousand people who came from all quarters of the three kingdoms, and, we may say also, of Europe, to be present at this novel and interesting spectacle. He who has his share in a battle can only tell—that is, if he has the good luck to escape scot-free—of what happened to himself and to those around him. So, of course, can we only speak of what we actually beheld. But, limited as the observation of one individual in such circumstances must necessarily be, either in a fight or at a tournament, and limited even as was the observation of us fifteen of the present jury, yet the faithful detail of what we did see, must be much more successful in conveying a just knowledge of the attendant circumstances to others, than the dry, concocted, general detail of the mere historian, who, seated in his closet, with his little stock-in-trade about him, mashes up the materials of others into a sort of minced calf's head, and puts them into a shape to be settled there, so as to turn them out cold into what may be called a presentable dish. This is our only apology for being somewhat prolix as regards our own adventures; and now having made it, such as it is, we shall proceed to approach more nearly to the scene of action.

Never did farmer, or sportsman, or tourist, or philosopher—for his crops, his game, his picturesque views, or his atmospherological observations—so narrowly watch the sky, and the carry of the clouds, or consult the barometer with so much anxiety, as did the party where we were, on the evening preceding "the great, the important day." Various were the fluctuations of opinion regarding the probable state of the approaching morning's weather. But, as is usual with all mortals, Hope—that most pleasing, flattering, but, at the same time, most deceitful of all goddesses—threw her fascinating films of fancy over every one of us.

We, to a man, yes, and a woman too, united in swearing to the belief, that low as the mercury might be, it was still most propitiously convex, and, consequently, that it must be about to rise; and, accordingly, to bed we went, hugging ourselves in the expectation that we should awake in sunshine. We did awake in sunshine; we awoke not only with our eyes dazzled with it, but with our hearts full of it, for the morning was indeed beautiful: we have seldom seen a lovelier or more promising morning. But, experience is a wise teacher, though it hath sometimes fools for its pupils. However, we were no such fools as not to take one useful lesson from it on this occasion; and as the result of this, we therefore say, that, for our parts, we shall never again trust to the loveliness or the fair promise of an Ayrshire sun on the 28th of August.

But confident as we were at that time in our hopes, away we whirled with two friends, viz., the knight of the ruseful umbrella, and a certain well-known Baronet, in a carriage drawn by a pair of good posters, which had been long previously secured; and we soon ran through some thirteen miles or so, that lay between the house we left and the town of Ayr, where we found a capital breakfast ready for us at Dun's Inn. We had overtaken by the way, and passed, many curious rural figures and conveyances, all of whom were manifestly to be considered as rills which were descending from the mountains and glens, and were taking their course towards that great inundation of human beings, which was that day to cover the park at Eglinton. But we no sooner found ourselves in the main street of Ayr, than we felt that we had got into one of the great rivers of population, which was hurrying tumultuously forward to swell that immense ocean of human curiosity, that was gathering its mighty waves of living creatures about the lists. Crowds of pedestrians were urging towards the terminus of the Irvine railway; whilst carriages of all descriptions were passing rapidly through the town, filled inside and out with ladies and gentlemen, clad in strange antique, but extremely gay attire.

Our impatience began to prick us on, the moment that we had satisfied the prickings of our appetite with the fresh broiled salmon that was put down to us. Our horses were ordered out, and off we set. As we went, we could perceive that the whole road, so far as we could see before or behind us, was covered with carriages of every possible description. The railway, like a vast boa constrictor, had swallowed up those thousands of pedestrians, which would have otherwise rendered our road extremely difficult of travel. As we approached Irvine, we observed that the whole of the vessels of the port were decorated with flags of every possible gaudy hue. But when we had run through the whole eleven miles, and actually found ourselves within the precincts of the town, we passed under the fronts of houses, where every window, garret skylight, and all, was tenanted by people of both sexes, all dressed in their best, and all eagerly squeezing out their bodies and straining their eyes to behold the miraculous stream of strangers that was pouring in upon them.

But, alas ! by this time there was something else also that began to pour in streams as well as the strangers : the rain most suddenly and most unexpectedly descended from the clouds, as if it was as eager to be present at the Tournament as we or any other people were. We should have been damped by it, especially the Baronet and I, who had preferred the rumble of the carriage. But besides our ordinary Macintosh, we had on the Macintosh of Hope, who, though she has no patent, makes a very seducing sort of article. The rain, therefore, had no effect upon us : we dashed through the crowded streets of the town, jostling, crossing, and crashing as we went, in the full expectation that the weather would soon clear up, and that all would yet be right. We felt it to be impossible that an affair of so much importance could be baulked by bad weather ; and having driven to a house, taken for the occasion by one of our friends, who was to be a performer in the lists, we secured the safety of our baggage, and then proceeded on our way to Eglinton Castle.

As we drove out of Irvine by the road that leads to Lord Eglinton's gate, we felt it to be a difficult matter to determine whether the streams of people or the streams of rain were the most remarkable. Yet if it had been possible for any one to have seen the people without being aware that the rain was falling so heavily, he could not have gathered that fact from the conduct or actions of any one individual of the crowd. Umbrellas were up in abundance, it is true ; but those who bore them, and those who had not the good fortune to be so protected, alike walked stiffly and sturdily along, with a look of determination that shewed they were not to be turned from their present purpose by a little drop of rain. The fair sex—wives, old maids, and maidens—were all dressed out in their best ; and, in point of beauty, we must say that the women of Ayrshire turned out that day in such a way as to give the Ayrshire men—husbands, fathers, and sweethearts—the highest cause to be proud of them. The weather was not unpropitious for enabling us to satisfy ourselves of this ; for, as the lasses strode firmly on over the plashy road, with kilted coats, we could perceive that, whether shielded in white cotton and leather, or more prudently and economically exposed bare to the wet, we could gather the important philosophical fact, that the limbs in general were, for the most part, such as Diana herself need hardly have been ashamed of. The old men and lads had, very generally, given obedience to the wish that Lord Eglinton had expressed, and put on the bonnet and plaid. They were, for the most part, good-looking men, with fine, well-set-up, athletic figures. We could not look at them without thinking that, but for the difference of a single generation or so, the immortal Burns might himself have been walking along with them in the self-same garb. Fancy led us to imagine that we beheld many a Burns among them ; and certainly we never felt prouder of our nation's peasantry, than when we looked down from our carriage upon the endless stream of intelligent countenances that moved on the footpaths by the side of the road, along which we were compelled to creep very slowly, by reason of the dense crowd of vehicles of all sorts, mingled with equestrians, that encumbered the way.

We must confess that we had never had the happiness to be at Eglinton Castle before, so that our knowledge of it is confined to the view of it which we enjoyed during the proceedings of that day. Our description, therefore, so far as it may be applicable to the locale, must be taken as the description of a stranger who has seen a place for the first time. The entrance to the park brought us into a long avenue through a wood of ancient trees, having in it all the wild nature of a forest. It was at this time that, most appropriately, we overtook that fine body of men, the Irvine Archers, in their Robin Hood sort of uniform—a circumstance peculiarly calculated to wind up our minds, if they had wanted winding up, to the full romance of the day. Referring our readers now to the diagrammatic wood-cuts, which, with no pretensions to accuracy, may aid them in understanding our description, we may now tell them that, as we broke out from among the denser wood upon the more open lawn, we began to catch glimpses of the large well-conceived pile of the castle, seen partially through the scattered groups of trees, with the broad banner of Eglinton floating bravely from its highest tower. At a little distance to the right of the great entrance, some crimson-coloured tents presented a brilliant effect. Men, in fitting costumes, and finger-posts at different parts, directed the endless stream of carriages and people on their way—"To the Tournament." We crossed a long and very handsome bridge at some distance from the castle. This led us over the narrow part of a lake, which wound away to the right, towards the bottom of the rising-ground on which the building stands ; and there we could see those huge wooden erections, newly attached to the lordly mansion, which were prepared for the banquets and balls. These were three hundred and seventy-five feet in length, by forty-five feet broad ; and being divided into a banquet-room and a ball-room, with a saloon between them, were capable of containing about two thousand guests. If the stories told of their construction be not true, Mr Pratt, who contracted for them, has been sorely belied. It was said that he had engaged to make them watertight—and, indeed, what was to be the use of them if they were not to be so?—and we were told that they had no other covering than some old sail-cloth, brought in a hurry to the spot from some sail-maker's yard at Greenock or Port Glasgow !

As an integral part of the great chain of human beings—in carriages, on horseback, and on foot—with whom we were linked, we made, in obedience to the directions, our postboy from time to time received, an extensive sweep around a part of the more open park ; and then we threaded through a thin screen of trees, and were brought at once within view of the low level plain in which the lists were placed. It lay amidst slopes of gently swelling greensward, the upper parts of which were surmounted by groves of the finest and largest grown timber. Now it was that we beheld enough to make us altogether forget the age we live in, and to conjure us back to those times when the spirit of chivalry reigned in all his pomp and pride. But, dismounting from our palfrey of romance, it appears to us, in sober commonplace sense, that this may perhaps, be the best time in which to give a description that may put the reader in full possession, as well as our poor descriptive powers can put him in possession, of the nature of those lists in which the whole action of the day was to take place.

A strong wooden defence, consisting of palisades five feet high, well boarded, enclosed an oblong space of strictly level ground of about three acres in extent—its length being 650 feet, and its breadth 250 feet. The tilting barrier ran longitudinally down the middle portion of the centre; it was also of wood, and its length was about 300 feet and its height about $4\frac{1}{2}$ feet. On the eastern, or rather, perhaps, we should say, southern side, were erected three ample wroden galleries; those to the right and left were uncovered, whilst that in the centre, which was called the gallery of the Queen of Beauty, was roofed with planks. A beautiful loge projected from the front of it, towards the Lists, which was destined for the Queen of Beauty herself, and which was capable, we should think, of holding thirty or more persons. The gallery to which it was attached was seated for above 800 people, and those to the right and left of it for about 600 each. The architecture of the front of the galleries was extremely elegant, being in the Moresco style, with tall, upright, lancet-shaped Gothic arches, richly painted and decorated in scarlet, crimson, and gold. The interior of the principal one was also painted—the seats were covered with crimson cloth—and the back wall was ornamented with a gorgeous antique sort of velvet-looking stuff. The seats rose one behind the other backwards; and as the roof also rose from over the back or uppermost seat forwards, it nowhere interrupted the view from within, whilst the front completely concealed it when the building was looked at from that direction. The Queen's own loge was fitted up in the most royal style with silken curtains, and draperies of crimson damask in due correspondence therewith. The pavilions of the knights were extremely gay, and fashioned with the greatest possible attention to those models which have been left to us by the descriptions which we find in our chroniclers, and by the illuminations which decorate their volumes. They were shaped with angular sides and roofs, from which projected those quaint-looking mock windows, which were always to be seen in those pavilions, and over each of which there was placed a stiff banner, of such a nature as to make the bearings with which it was charged always visible. The colours of the Earl of Eglinton, the Lord of the Tournament, were azure and or; and of these his pavilions and their attendant tents were composed. They occupied both sides of the entrance to the Lists, at the western end. On the right of Lord Eglinton stood the pavilion and tents of Lord George Beresford, the colours of which were sable and argent. On the left of Lord Eglinton were the pavilions of Mr Jerningham, gules and argent. Lord Glenlyon's tents and pavilions, which were azure, gules, and vert, were erected on the right of Lord George Beresford's; and to the right of Lord Glenlyon's were the gules and argent pavilions of Mr Lechmere; and to the right of them, next to the galleries, was placed the solitary, sombre, sable tent of the Black Knight. The gules and argent pavilions of the Earl of Craven occupied the centre of the eastern extremity of the Lists; and to his left were placed, in succession, Captain Fairlie's, gules and azure; Mr Lamb's, azure and or lozenge over argent; the Earl of Cassillis, Captain Gage, and Sir Francis Hopkins, argent; and to Lord Craven's right were Lord Alford's, azure and argent, and the Marquis of Waterford's, argent and sable. It is quite possible that we may not have enumerated all the pavilions and tents of the knights; but we have mentioned enough to give some notion of the splendour of the effect which they produced. The only feature that we think they wanted, was the trophy of arms which it was customary to set up before the entrance to each knight's pavilion, with a squire on each side of the shield, habited in wild dresses, in some degree representing the animals which were his supporters. For example, the shield of Lord Eglinton should have had a squire on each side of it, habited in a head mask and dress, so as to have, to a certain extent, represented the dragons which support his arms. This would have added a few more features to this most interesting spectacle. It only remains for us to mention, that a broad layer of five or six inches deep of saw-dust ran along either side of the barrier, where the courses were to be run. Opposite to the centre of the barrier, on each side of the lists, were placed the two upright poles, with a string across between them, from which the rings were to be suspended, for the exercise of riding at the ring; the huge, terrific, giant, Grim looking figure, the quintain, was stationed towards the north-east corner of the enclosure; and at either end of the lists were piles of painted lances.

After such a description of ancient forms, gaudy colours, and gay gilding in the inanimate features of the scene, in themselves presenting a magnificent coup-d'œil, amid the green herbage and the umbrageous foliage of the park, we may now ask the reader to conceive the effect which was produced by the multitude of human beings which gave life to it. At the time we drove up, the 2000 seats in the galleries, where every individual was visible, were almost all occupied; and the greater part of those who were so seated—and certainly nearly every one of the 800 persons who were in the gallery of the Queen of Beauty—were attired in the richest and most appropriate costumes of ancient times, and particularly in those of the fifteenth century. Nothing was to be seen but silks, satins, and velvets of the most splendid hues—the finest furs—brilliant armour—glittering gold—sparkling gems, and still more sparkling eyes. With such materials of drapery, and with the loveliest women, and with some of the noblest in the land, was the Queen of Beauty's gallery filled from one end to the other, and from back to front; so that the sight was enough absolutely to bewilder the senses of the spectator. If we have been at all successful in conveying anything like a correct idea of the reality to the imagination of those who were not present, we are quite sure that no one will say, that, on such a spectacle suddenly opening on our eyes, as we drove down into the little plain, where it was spread like a fairy vision before us, we were much to be wondered at for exclaiming aloud with admiration, at being thus, as it were, fairly whirled back, in one moment, to the days of Froissart and the ancient times of chivalry. But, however this may be, we must honestly confess that such was the fact.

Having taken our places in the gallery of the Queen of Beauty, we had now leisure to observe, that all around the outside of the lists, and in various other parts of the surrounding park, there were thousands of carriages of all descriptions and denominations, laden with people, as well as equestrians and pedestrians without number. But by far the finest portion of this part of the spectacle was that presented by the broad and ample slope of green turf, which arose with a gentle swell from the plain on the northern side of the lists, and stretched to either side, so far as considerably to outflank both ends of them, having the long flat eminence above it crowned with the huge and wide-spreading trees of a large grove. On that green slope, between the trees and the plain below, there might be thirty or forty thousand people, forming a sight which was absolutely sublime. Besides all these, there were dense crowds in every part of the park, wherever a piece of vantage ground could be obtained, or where a human foot could find a resting-place. And the remarkable thing was, that not an individual of the crowd seemed to move from the place first occupied, notwithstanding the drenching rain to which all were exposed.

From our present position we could now see the towers of the castle, at the distance of about half-a-mile; its mass rising from the opposite bank of a small stream, which, having its origin in the lake we have mentioned, took its course down through a gently inclined, little, grassy valley, towards the western end of the plain, where the lists were placed. The view of the building, with its broad banner floating in the breeze from its summit, and the figures of men moving about among its battlements—the crimson tents on the lawn in front of its entrance court, which was turned away from us; and the long pale-dun course, which, leaving the front of the castle, ran sweeping round out of sight towards the bridge we have already mentioned, and then again appearing round the back of the castle to the eastward, came winding down, like a long snake, on the hither side of the valley from behind the noble groves of trees that gave intricacy to the park in that direction, and crowned the sloping bank and higher ground that extended in front of us; and then making one bold turn in the direction of the lists, approached them in one long straight line—we say that all this had a magnificent effect, and gave grand note of preparation. The length of this enclosed course we should suppose to be nearly a mile; and, so far as we could see, the palisades on its sides were everywhere pressed upon from without by dense crowds of eagerly expectant spectators throughout its whole line.

The spirits of those who were in the Queen of Beauty's gallery, and, we doubt not, the spirits of all those who were present in the field, were gladdened by the gradual cessation of the rain; and we had not been long in our places when it became quite fair, so that our hopes, which had been so cruelly sunk, now rose to the highest pitch. Time slipped away without producing anything like a commencement of the doings of the day; yet there was no such thing as any exhibition of symptoms of tedium or impatience among those by whom we were surrounded in the gallery: all seemed to be sufficiently occupied with admiring the dresses of those around them, as well as in becoming acquainted with the countenances of many of the distinguished individuals whom they had not happened to have seen before, or in dwelling, as we confess that we did, with admiration on the lovely features and forms which everywhere presented themselves to our eyes. This was an occupation which might have kept the whole of us alive for many a good hour. But, at this time it was that the programme of the order of the procession was handed about for sale; and so, with certain corrections now made upon it, we may here venture to give it as tolerably free from error, prefixing to it the account of the method by which we understand that the ceremonial was arranged previous to the procession's moving from the castle.

The horses of the knights and esquires, under care of the grooms, &c., were arranged on the right of the grand entrance; and the retainers and men-at-arms on the left, according to their priority in the procession. A chamberlain and a trumpeter were on each side of the door. A deputy-marshal, with the seneschal, were situated in the outer hall. A chamberlain was placed at the door of the inner hall or vestibule, and at each of the three doors leading from the vestibule into the three principal reception rooms.

The knights, esquires, and the principal personages forming part of the procession, assembled in the three above-named rooms, and were arranged in their order of joining the procession by the deputy-marshals and pursuivants. The deputy-marshal called from his roll the name of the first person to head the procession—the chamberlain at the outer door ordered his horses, retinue, &c., to advance—the chamberlain stationed at the inner door summoned the personage so named to take his place in the procession. This done, the party rode up the line of route to a given point, so as to allow a space for the marshalling of the whole cavalcade. This order was continued until the whole were mounted and marshalled, which being proclaimed by the chamberlain and trumpet at the entrance, the procession proceeded en route to the lists, to the sound of warlike music and blasts of the trumpet. The line of march was kept by mounted men-at-arms at regular distances, assisted by the retainers and halberdiers (on foot) of the Lord of the Tournament. On arriving at the lists, the procession entered at the principal gate; and after making the half circuit, the King of the Tournament, the judges of the field, &c., with their attendant knights and esquires, were dismounted and marshalled to their appointed seats in the Gothic gallery. The King, Queen, &c., having assumed their thrones, (to which the latter was conveyed in a coach and four,) a prolonged flourish of the trumpets summoned the knights and esquires to pay their devoirs to the Queen of Beauty; and the whole riding again round, received from their ladies the favours, gloves, scarfs, &c., to be worn in their helmets during the Tourney. Another blast of trumpets gave notice to the knights to retire to their separate pavilions, to complete their arming, and await the summons of the herald and his trumpeters. The knights rode from their pavilions completely armed, after being assisted to their chargers by their esquires, and took their stations on the ground appointed to them, when, the trumpets having again sounded, the herald of the Tourney gave notice that they were ready to do their devoir against any knight who might demand the combat. On this the knight elected to run the first course against the challengers left his tent, armed at all points, and riding up to the gallery, demanded permission to make his assay, which was granted. At the cry of "Laissez les aller," the trumpets sounded the charge, and the knights ran the appointed courses.

The following is the order in which the Procession reached the ground, taken from the official programme; the only digression from which was the circumstance of the "Queen of Beauty" and attendants being conveyed to the ground in carriages, owing to the wetness of the weather:—

The following were the rules which were given out as those to be observed in the tilting lists:—

1. No Knight can be permitted to ride without having on the whole of his tilting pieces.

2. No Knight to ride more than six courses with the same opponent.

3. It is expressly enjoined by the Earl of Eglinton, and must be distinctly understood by each Knight upon engaging to run a course, that he is to strike his opponent on no other part than the shield, and that an atteint made elsewhere (or the lance broken across) will be adjudged foul, and advantage in former courses forfeited.

4. Lances of equal length, substance, and quality, as far as can be seen, will be delivered to each Knight; and none others will be allowed.

Particular attention will be most earnestly requested to be paid to this injunction, for the general good and credit of the tournament.

N.B.—In default of the lances being splintered in any course, the judge will decide for the atteint made nearest to the centre of the shield.

ACTIONS WORTHY OF HONOUR.

1. To break the most lances.
2. To break the lance in more places than one.
3. Not to put the lance in rest until near your opponent.
4. To meet point to point of the lances.
5. To strike on the emblazonment of shield.
6. To perform all the determined courses.

ACTIONS OF DISHONOUR.

1. To break the lance across the opponent.
2. To strike or hurt the horse.
3. To strike the saddle.
4. To drop the lance or sword.
5. To lose the management of the horse at the encounter.
6. To be unhorsed—the greatest dishonour.
7. All lances broken by striking below the girdle to be disallowed.

ACTIONS MOST WORTHY.

1. To break the lance in many pieces.

AT THE TOURNEY OR BARRIER.

1. Two blows to be given in passing, and ten at the encounter.

These rules are very much taken from those of ancient times; and hence may be estimated the absurdity of those wisecracks who seemed to consider the combat as altogether naught, and the whole thing ridiculous, because no one was unhorsed by his adversary. Now, we apprehend that of tilting there were two different degrees—the first was that tilting of courtesy, of which it was the object of the proceedings at Eglinton Castle to give a specimen. In the olden time, no piece of courtesy could be greater than that of one knight offering to break a spear with another. The utmost intention of such an encounter, was to break a spear by pushing it against the adversary's shield; and to prevent anything like the risk of either party being unhorsed, the spears were always made of brittle wood, and they were, moreover, not unfrequently cut partly through, so as to ensure their breaking the moment they were properly planted against the opponent's shield or armour. The point, moreover, was not sharp, but it terminated in a broad, flat piece of the wood of which it was formed, called the crotchet, which bore the same relation to the lance that the button does to the foil. Now these were precisely the lances with which the tilting at Eglinton was performed, and, therefore, he who looked for the unhorsing of the combatants—and still more, he who looked, as we verily believe some did, to see some of them pierced through and through their armour—were as ignorant as they were blood-thirsty. The second style of tilting of old, was that with the ashen-shaft—a tough instrument, which, instead of the crotchet, at its smaller extremity, had three iron prongs, about an inch and a half, or two inches long, each prong being blunt at the point, so that, whilst they were less likely to slip off the shield or crest, there was no risk of their penetrating either. The object of this amusement was to unsaddle and unhorse the adversary; and although it likewise was always practised in good humour, the falls produced by it were not unfrequently fatal from the concussion. It was said that Lord Waterford had expressed himself especially desirous of having a few courses with the ashen-shaft—and perhaps for the benefit of us who were spectators, it is to be regretted that he could not have been indulged. The third and superlative degree of tilting was that when they fought with grounden points of steel, a method which was resorted to in cases of duel; and if the challenge was to the outrance, the knights, when their lances were shattered, or rendered useless, dismounted and fought on foot with their battle axes, hewing at each other with might and main, till the armour of both was frequently hacked off piece meal—and when one or both were rolled on the ground, the poignard was frequently resorted to; and if the Sovereign, if present, or the King of the Tournament, did not throw down his warder to stop the combat, it always ended in the death of one or other of the knights. But the tournament at Eglinton being, as we have already said, a gentle and courteous passage of arms, it was just as reasonable to expect that mischief should be done, as it would be for any one to go to that most interesting exhibition of the scholars of Mr Roland, the fencing master, which takes place periodically in our Assembly Rooms in George Street, with the expectation of seeing one out of every pair of the youths who fence together, run through the body with the foil.

One remarkable feature of the Eglinton Tournament, and one which would have warmed the very heart of Sir Walter Scott, or any other such antiquary, was the circumstance that, not only was all the armour of the most exquisite workmanship and of genuine antiquity—some of it being as old as the time of Richard II.—but there was hardly one suit of it that had not some interesting history attached to it. Why is Sir Walter not alive to be the chronicler of the Eglinton Tournament! How eloquently would he have revelled in all the historical recollections which every fragment of the armour used at it would have conjured up in his mind! That, for instance, of Lord Craven was particularly remarkable. It was of the purest blue-burnished Milan steel, decorated with gold studs or rivets, and curiously inlaid with the same metal, in an exquisitely wrought arabesque pattern. It came from the Manorial Hall of Hylton Castle, and it was the armour worn by the Baron Hylton at the Battle of Cressy. The casque or helmet weighed nearly forty pounds. Yet, may we remark, touching the weight of the helmets, that we learned from some of the knights themselves, that the casque was the only part of the armour which they felt at all oppressive, if worn for any length of time. But as it was never worn in former days except when the knight was actually in action, either in battle or in the lists, the weight was of less consequence. As for the rest of the pieces of the armour, it is a curious fact that there was hardly a piece of any suit at the Eglinton Tournament, which was not found to be too small for the man that was destined to wear it.

After these explanations, we may perhaps be permitted to employ some of the time, whilst we are waiting in the gallery till the show begins, in expressing our indignation at what we hold to be the unfair and brutish tone which some of the productions of the press have displayed in commenting on the Eglinton Tournament. Whether it was prudent or otherwise, for the Earl of Eglinton to incur so great an expense for any such object, is a private question, which affects him alone, and it is therefore a question with which the public have nothing in the world to do. But that question being thus disposed of, we maintain that the public are in all respects under very high obligations to him. If, to read an accurate account of any such custom of our ancestors as that of the Tournament, be, as it will be admitted by all educated minds to be, most interesting, must it not be a greater subject of interest to be permitted to look upon an accurate painting of such a thing? But if these propositions be admitted, must we not feel a tenfold interest, and a tenfold gratitude to that noble and liberal individual, who, at an enormous expense and trouble to himself, actually produces the real spectacle, with all its living and moving actors and gorgeous accompaniments, in bodily presence before us? And when we take into account the immense time which was necessarily consumed in the preparations, and the liberality with which all the world, of all ranks and stations, were invited and provided for, so that every one could see the whole—the magnificent scale on which everything was done—the princely manner in which provision was made for the entertainment of the guests—and the indefatigable courtesy which was exhibited to all by the Earl, and every one belonging to him, under circumstances the most trying that could well be conceived, we must say that nothing, in the least degree to be compared with it, has been done in modern times. Little, indeed, do we envy the feelings or the taste of that man who, after partaking of all this, could convert so much honey into waspish gall, to be ejected in some vulgar, ignorant, and poisonous paragraph. We who, God wot, are much more accustomed to stand up for the peasant than the peer, cannot forget that the luxurious and uncontrolled expenditure of the rich, however injurious it may be to themselves, must always go to give better bread to the industrious poor; and when we reflect on the immense expenditure of money which the Eglinton Tournament must have cost and occasioned, and the thousands of the industrious classes who must have benefited thereby, we cannot help saying, that if those noblemen who can afford so large an expenditure, without at all injuring their private fortunes, shall emulate the Earl of Eglinton, and give us similar exhibitions at proper intervals, it will be a consequence, in our opinion, by no means to be grieved at, and we shall be happy to go any distance to be present. So far as we are concerned, we think that the Earl of Eglinton has well earned that honourable tribute which we understand is proposed to be paid to him by giving him a piece of plate; and although our purse is anything but well lined, we shall be proud to give our guinea towards so laudable an object.

But now the attention and the expectation of the spectators begin to be awakened by the occasional appearance of a squire, or a man-at-arms, riding down from the castle in the road between the palisadoes towards the lists, in full and correct costume, his horse venit a terre, on some errand of haste from the knight whose colours he wears. Our anxiety was every moment increasing, and all eyes and eye-glasses began to be eagerly directed towards the distant platform in front of the castle. We availed ourselves of our pocket telescope, and through it we perceived the fluttering of gaudy banners and pennons, the pawing and prancing of richly caparisoned horses, the waving of plumes, and the glittering of armour. Occasionally a rider would shoot suddenly forth from the crowd like a meteor, unwillingly carried off by the ungovernable impetuosity of his horse, and pursuing a course like that of a comet among the purple tents, and among the trees of the lawn, he would come curving round again as he gradually gathered the mastery of the animal. It was now about three o'clock, and the sky began to blacken, and the clouds to lower most portentously. The question came to be—and it was a most anxious one—Whether will the rain or the procession come first? But, alas! it was soon settled; for, in about a quarter of an hour, and just as with our glasses we could see that the procession was getting into order of march, down came the rain in a heavy and determined fall. There was not a soul present—with the exception, perhaps, of some of those jaundiced gentlemen to whom we have already alluded—who did not feel deep disappointment; and whose disappointment, moreover, was not deeper on account of his sympathy with that of Lord Eglinton. Speculation was, of course, immediately abroad, as to whether the Tournament would now go on at all. In prudence, perhaps, it ought to have been delayed; but Lord Eglinton being desirous of keeping his word with the people—many of whom had come from great distances to see the spectacle—like a true knight, who never fails to maintain the integrity of his vow, determined that the business of the day should proceed at all hazards.

Accordingly, the distant sound of trumpets, and other martial instruments, now came faintly upon the breeze; and we could behold the onward movement of the column of the procession, from the platform before the castle, in a westerly direction. The successive groups of horsemen disappeared towards that point of the compass, whilst fresh bodies were continually following; and, long ere the whole had left the castle gates, the trumpets were heard sounding with greater strength; and the head of the column of march, which had swept over the bridge, and round by the palisadoed road on the bank to the east of the edifice, began to reappear from among the trees of the park, between us and the upper part of the little valley where the rill ran. The crowds which cumbered the back of the palisadoes were so great, that, at the distance they were then at from us, we could only see the fluttering banners and pennons, and the heads and shoulders of the horsemen; but the increasing clangor of the trumpets, and the shouts of the people, gave sufficient note of the gradual advance of the line of march. By and by, we began to discover that a number of carriages preceded the procession; and, as these came at a quicker pace, an universal suspicion arose that the spectacle was thus to be curtailed of its fairest features, and that these vehicles carried the Queen of Beauty and the other ladies; who, since they were prevented by the weather from riding with the knights, were naturally desirous to be seated in the gallery as speedily as possible. Our attention was first drawn to them as they entered the lists. In one carriage was Lady Seymour, the Queen of Beauty, a title to which nature has given her ladyship the most indisputable right. She was richly and most appropriately attired, with her crown upon her head; and there was a mingled mildness, and modesty, and dignity in her dark blue eye, that commanded the willing homage of all hearts. For our parts, if any knight had been so hardy as to deny that she was the most peerless princess in the universe, we should ourselves have been ready to have tossed our gauntlet over the gallery—to have descended into the lists—to have armed and mounted in support of her unrivalled pretensions—and to have maintained them with grounden spears to the outhouse. The Queen and her ladies immediately took their places in the loge appropriated for her; and there, as the silken curtains were drawn around them to defend them from the wet which would have otherwise blown in upon them, we also thanked our stars that we were relieved from the overwhelming blaze of that galaxy of beauty, to look upon which unmoved required more of the copper coating of modern dandyism than we are possessed of.

The carriages were now cleared away, and the procession began to advance towards the entrance to the lists, amidst the shouts of the people. We have seen many fine spectacles, and processions in our days; but we are prepared to contend that no spectacle or procession of modern times, not bating that of a coronation itself, ever came within many degrees of this as to splendour. One only that we have beheld, exceeded it in interest; and that was the procession of the forty or fifty thousand grateful hearts, who, full of joy for the gift of Reform, which their determination had wrenched from an unwilling House of Peers, assembled in triumph in Bruntsfield Links, and paraded through the streets of Edinburgh, on the 10th day of August, 1832. Alas! how that great modern charter of our liberties has since been worm-eaten, almost to caddis, by the reptiles of Toryism! But this is neither the time nor the place for such disagreeable reflections. Let us not embitter our feelings, therefore, by any such thoughts.

The effect produced by the appearance of the body of stalwart men-at-arms who led the procession, and filled up some other parts of it, in their harn-pans, or iron skull-caps, and their back and breast pieces, and mounted on their great heavy horses, was most striking. So was that of the halberdiers, and bearers of two-handed swords. The banners, and the emblazoned coats of the heralds, were splendid. Lord Saltoun, as Judge of the Peace, was most appropriately dressed in a black robe, and looked his character well. But Sir Charles Lamb, the Knight Marshall of the Lists, with his silken surcoat, richly embroidered with his emblazonments over a very fine suit of armour, was perhaps one of the best and most correctly dressed figures of the whole pageant; and the manner in which he acquitted himself, throughout the whole affair, proved that the spirit of ancient chivalry was thoroughly in him, and would have done credit to any preux chevalier of ancient days. After him came the beautiful, richly caparisoned palfreys of the ladies, led by squires; but, alas! with empty saddles. The most gorgeous person of all was certainly the Marquis of Londonderry, with his crown upon his head, as King of the Tournament, and his rich purple velvet robe trimmed with ermine, which covered the whole hind quarters of the animal he rode, and swept the very ground. We have noticed, in some of the printed accounts of the Tournament, certain reflections on the manner in which he managed his horse. These, we have no hesitation in saying, display the grossest ignorance, if not malevolence in their authors, whom we strongly suspect to have been some of the disappointed tailors who had not been called upon to furnish anything for the show, and who never crossed a horse but to ride to Brentford. Nothing could have been more graceful, nothing could have displayed a more perfect knowledge of equitation, than the manner in which his Lordship made his horse-passage across the ground in front of the loge of the Queen of Beauty; and this we will maintain in the lists against all comers, excepting always those miscreant knights of the needle and thimble, who have so disgraced themselves by these calumnies. The Jester was well enough as to costume, but very sorry and vulgar in his wit. We think that this character was the only thing like a failure in the whole matter. We do not blame the gentleman who did it, because we think that he was manifestly out of his element. It should have been supported by some wag of quality, who could have had no fear of exercising the privilege of the cap and bells at the expense of the men with whom he was in daily intimacy, and with whose various tempers, dispositions, and histories he was well acquainted. We understand that the gentleman was a wit and an artist, and he may be very clever in both these capacities; but the cleverest man on earth, without the requisites we have mentioned, would have found himself at fault on such an occasion. His best joke was his remark after the first ineffectual career, when he rode past the gallery, crying—"Ho! ho! if the Ayrshire eagles look to dine to-day upon a dead knight, they will be long enough before they find one." And again, when the Marquis of Waterford was mounted preparatory to tilting, he took out a sketch-book, and said that "he was about to make an Irish scriptural sketch—the Marquis of Waterford's head upon a charger." The rest of his flashes appeared to us to be flashes in the pan. The Earl of Eglinton, the Lord of the Tournament himself, was armed most magnificently, man and horse, in a full suit of embossed and splendidly gilt armour, the caparison of his horse being the richest possible blue satin and cloth of gold. The plumed helmets, and the shields of all the knights, were borne each by a separate esquire, till they were called upon to arm them for the tilting. Most of the knights, therefore, rode in their cowls; but when Lord Eglinton entered the lists, he wore a velvet bonnet of antique cut, with a plume in it, with which he acknowledged the plaudits of the spectators with the most graceful courtesy. Every one admired the perfect equanimity he displayed in the midst of the trying disappointment that had arisen from the weather and its consequences; and he carried off with him the affections and the sympathies of all present. The effects produced by the gonfalons or banners, which were borne before the several knights, each exhibiting their coats armorial, together with the large groups of gay-looking, and correctly dressed esquires and other horsemen, who formed the cortege of each of them respectively, all mounted upon horses of the first breed and spirit, was truly noble and animating. After the list we have already given, we need not repeat their names. We may mention, however, that those of the suite of Lord Waterford were particularly remarkable for splendour and for the excellence of their horses. His cortege was also particularly distinguished, by having in its ranks a jolly friar and a lean monk, who seemed to have more of the spirit of the Holy Clerk of Copmanhurst in their composition than of the peaceable austerities of the cloister. As they rode merrily to the lists, these holy men chanted melodies which were anything but those of the cathedral choir; and the most noble and frolicsome knight in whose company they were, and all his merry men, joined lustily in the chorus, till they made the good greenwood ring again. Lord Glenlyon's cortege had the interesting addition of an hundred Athol followers on foot—very fine men—uniformly dressed in the Highland garb, and each of them armed with targe and claymore. And here we must be excused for entering into a defence of this also, from the ignorant and unjust criticism with which it has been visited; for although the possessions of knights lay in the Highlands, that was no reason why they should not—as we know instances of their having done of old—enter the lists with Southrons; nor can there be any ground for objecting to that which must have often occurred, and did often occur; we mean, that in addition to their esquires and men-at-arms, they should also have been attended by a body of their faithful clansmen. Among the other knights who followed, it would be vain, as well as tedious, to particularize one more than another; but still we cannot help especially noticing Sir Francis Hopkins, as one whose array was by no means of the worst.

It was indeed a grand sight to behold this brilliant body of mailed and gaily attired men, curvetting on their pampered and richly caparisoned coursers, slowly and gracefully, as the procession wound its way around the lists, whilst the sunshine that fell upon them from many a bright pair of eyes, seemed more than to compensate to them for the absence of the cheering countenance of the god of day. After the tail of the procession, like that of a glittering and gilded snake, had drawn itself within the area, the space below presented to the eye the appearance of one waving sea of splendour, as it did to the ear of martial sound, defying description. All having now, as they passed in succession, paid their obeisance to the loge of Beauty, each knight now filed off with his people to his respective pavilion; the Irvine archers and the Highlanders surrounded the palisades of the lists, and the Marshal; and the Judge of the Peace, took their stations, each with his trumpets and his attendants, one on either side of the centre of the barrier, the former on the north, and the latter on the south side of it, whilst two of the knights were preparing to enter the lists by arming with their helmets and shields.

Whilst they are so employed, we may take the opportunity to explain, once for all, that the tilting was conducted at Eglinton precisely as it always was in the olden time; that is to say, in this manner:—The opposing knights were placed at opposite ends of the barrier, each with the barrier on his left, and his bridle rein held by a groom to keep the horse steady. The Marshal of the Lists then asked each of the knights in turn if he were ready; and, on being answered in the affirmative, the "Laissez aller" was uttered—the trumpets sounded from both sides of the barrier—the grooms on both sides, each ran a pace or two with the horse he held, so as to start him fairly in his proper course; and the knights being closely followed by their squires, and frequently at some few paces distant by a part of their cortege, gave their spurs to their horses, roused them to full action, and rushed on in their career; and each having the lance in his right hand, he put it in rest, and tilted at his adversary over the barrier at the moment when he thought he had come within reach of him. The second course proceeded in the same way, only the two knights having now changed places, they rode on the opposite side, and from the opposite end of the barrier, to that which they had ridden on and from before; and so on. All this was quite selon les regles des joutes. Any one who will take the trouble of considering how great that quickness of eye, and readiness of arm must be, that must be required to catch, and to use to effect the only transient, and, as we may call it, mathematical moment which can be available during the rapid career of the horses in opposite directions, will be more disposed to wonder that a hit should ever be made at all, than that so many failures should happen.

The first two knights who appeared were Captain Fairlie, the Knight of the Golden Lion, opposed to the Hon. Mr Jerningham, the Knight of the Swan. In their first course, they passed without touching. In their second course, he of the Lion deranged the chamfron or steel frontlet of the horse of him of the Swan. In the third, the horse of him of the Swan swerved from the barrier ; but, in the fourth, his rider succeeded in shivering his lance on the shield of the Lion. The contest was most animating, and the most intense interest began now to be excited among the spectators.

This was by no means diminished when it was observed that the Lord of the Tournament himself, the Earl of Eglinton, appeared at the western extremity of the barrier. Nothing could surpass the magnificence of his appearance, when thus armed cap-a-pee in his gorgeous golden plate, with his coronet and crest on his casque, amid the blue and white ostrich-feathers that formed its plume. His seat in his saddle was easy and dignified, and the manege of his beautiful horse was, in every respect, so perfect, that his appearance was hailed with deafening shouts of applause from all quarters. The Marquis of Waterford, the Knight of the Dragon, was his worthy opponent. The pace at which these two noble and very redoubtable knights went was tremendous. When the trumpet sounded, the Marquis dashed his spurs rowel-deep into the horse's sides, so that he sprang forward over the ground at the full extent of his speed. As they met in mid career, Lord Eglinton shivered his lance on his opponent's shield, with a clang that resounded through the lists, and brought bursts of applause from the spectators. In their second course, both knights missed each other ; but, in the third course, the Lord of the Tournament was again successful in breaking his lance on the armour of his adversary. The martial music sounded ; the shouts of the multitude were renewed ; and were again excited tenfold, when, as conqueror, he rode up opposite to the royal loge, and paid his devoirs to the Queen of Beauty, with a grace quite corresponding to the superior skill he had displayed in the encounter.

Sir Francis Hopkins, the Knight of the Burning Tower, and Mr Lechmere, the Knight of the Red Rose, were the next two combatants who appeared ; and their's too was a most interesting encounter. In the first course, he of the Tower touched his adversary without breaking his lance. The second course was peculiarly good ; for he of the Tower shivered his lance so violently on his adversary that the fragments were thrown high into the air, whilst he of the Rose also broke off the crotchet from the point of his lance. In the third course, he of the Tower broke his lance on his opponent's casque, and was led up, as conqueror, to pay his devoirs to the Queen of Beauty. We particularly remarked the excellence of Sir Francis' seat, as well as the extraordinary command of his horse, which he exhibited ; the animal being one that seemed to be anything but pleasant, to ride and, that on one occasion, did all he possibly could do to unseat his master. But the knight was his master ; and the manner in which he pulled him short up, when in full career, so as to make him stand stock still at the end of the barrier, round which he immediately wheeled him to be ready for the next encounter, caused universal admiration, Lord Alford, the Knight of the Black Lion, and Lord Glenlyon, the Knight of the Gael, were the next pair. It was a new, as well as an appropriate feature in this match, to see a tartan-clad groom at Lord Glenlyon's bridle-rein. The knight's missed in their first course. In their second, the lance of the Knight of the Gael was struck by him of the Black Lion who, in the third course, broke his lance on the body of his opponent.

Whilst all these deeds were doing, the rain continued to increase ; and Lord Eglinton rode up to the front of the Queen's gallery, and taking off his bonnet, he bowed to the ladies, and said—"I regret much that I am compelled thus to announce that, in consequence of the insufficiency of the temporary buildings at the castle, the rain has so destroyed everything, as to put it out of my power to fulfil my intention of giving an entertainment to my friends." As every one present felt more from sympathy for his Lordship than for themselves, his short and manly declaration was received with the clapping of hands, and every possible symptom of satisfaction. But deep if not loud curses were uttered by many against Mr Pratt, the contractor for the buildings ; and with what justice may be conceived when we think of what the consequences might have been, if the rain had kept off till we were all assembled in glory at the banquet, and then poured down. Had this happened, every lady would have been drenched in less than a quarter of an hour, and the scene of confusion that would have been created may be easily imagined. Filled with the conviction of such possibilities, we did hear it whispered, that the repetition of that page of chivalric history, in which we read of the tossing of that worthy squire, Sancho Panza, in a blanket, would have been a happy incident of the Tournament, if the principal performer of the scene had been the handsome and accomplished Mr Spratt.

A combat with two-handed swords now began between two men-at-arms, Mr Mackay and Mr Redbury, which added another feature of reality to the vraisemblance of the whole scene. Both acquitted themselves manfully, and with great skill ; and their breast and back pieces rang with the blows, amidst the most animating cheers from the spectators.

Lord Cassillis, the Knight of the Dolphin, and Lord Alford, the Knight of the Black Lion, now appeared in the lists. In their first course their lances crossed without breaking. In the second, he of the Dolphin broke his lance on the armour of his opponent. In the last course both lances crossed, and the Knight of the Dolphin again broke his lance.

But the mere detail of these encounters can furnish no idea to any one, who was not present, of the romantic and exciting interest of this most wonderful spectacle—of the effect of the rush of the opposing knights in their career, followed as they were by their esquires and their other attendants in irregular flying troops, whilst the arena underneath the eye was continually agitated by flitting figures of the olden time, some on foot, and others riding it here, and pricking it there, in all directions, so as absolutely to bewilder the fancy, till the imagination began to boil up into the conviction that years had rolled back their tide, and that we had been actually cast thereby on the ancient shore of chivalry. Nay, we must confess that the illusion with us was so strong, that if any one had asked us at that moment whether we had been personally acquainted with Harry Hotspur, or the Douglas, or with John of Gaunt, we suspect that we should have innocently replied that we knew all these excellent fellows perfectly well.

The doings of the day being now over, and the banquet and ball, to which we had been invited, having been finished before they began, thanks to the insufficient materials of Mr Pratt's trumpery—(we beg his pardon)—temporary buildings, we hastened to make our way from the field across the park, amidst draggled crowds of pedestrians of all ranks, from all of whom, in defiance of the drenching that many of them had received, we heard nothing escaping but expressions of delight, and of the highest encomium on the generous nobleman who had given them so princely a show. We were particularly admiring the graceful gait and the handsome figure of a Highlander, who was stepping out over the green turf before us with a fine, firm, free pace; not decked out with pistol and powderhorn, and in all the eagle-wing pride and the rich silver and cairngorum ornaments of the chief, but clad in the simple kilt, hose, plaid, and unplumed bonnet of a shepherd from the hill-side. For such, indeed, we took him, though he might have been young Norval for aught we knew; but we had no sooner come up to him than we were recognised by him, and he held out to us the hand of—the Marquis of Douglas.

Having extricated ourselves from the intricacies of the park, and got fairly into the road to Irvine, we found ourselves in the midst of that which was perhaps the strangest scene in which we ever mingled: The pathway was so crowded, that no individual could attempt to get on beyond a certain pace, without the certainty of both giving and receiving many an admonitory kick in the shins; and the carriage way was filled with vehicles, all of which had characters of both sexes, of the fourteenth and fifteenth centuries, seated within them; whilst squires, mixed up with grooms, and men-at-arms, were seen riding along at a slinging pace; their buff boots, silk hose, velvet doublets, and plumed bonnets, all bespattered and drenched, like turkey poults after a thunder plump. As we got nearer to the town of Irvine, the crush became greater; and it went on accumulating, till the jamming and crashing of carriages of all sorts in the street exceeded anything we have ever yet witnessed in London, even on an opera night; with this addition, that the old dresses of the squires and ladies of all degrees, and the ancient armour of the knights, when thus associated with modern carriages of every description, presented the most whimsical appearance. Here you had a bluff man-at-arms, making love in the rumble to a delicate looking lady's-maid, who sat beside him vainly trying to keep herself dry with a tiny silk parasol. There you had a burly halberdier sitting, halberd and all, on the box of another carriage, beside the coachman in his many-caped box coat. Again you would espy a knight in his armour, sitting bodkin in a chariot between two damsels, whose countenances betrayed that the thought of their dresses made them grievously distressed by his proximity. A little afterwards, you would discover a mailed hero in a britzka, solacing himself with a cigar; and anon, you might behold, armed in full proof, the most noble the Marquis of Waterford, worming his difficult and arduous way through the opposing obstacles, with anything but a patient countenance, in his buggy. All this produced a motley-medley, of which no one, who did not witness it, can have any conception. Then the yells, the cries, the execrations, and the jarring of contending wheels, defy all description; as well as the strange expression of rage and fear, that agitated the different human countenances you beheld. It reminded us of the celebrated rout of the French after the Battle of Vittoria. We remarked one man, a fat farmer, who, quite unprepared for any such struggle as this in the street of Irvine, had quietly taken up his wonted position, in his one-horse four-wheeled chay, opposite to the Eglington Arms, as he might have often done before on a market day; but, alas! poor man, he found, upon this occasion, that, according to the old Proverb, there was "a change of market days." He had very innocently, in his ignorance, turned his horse's head against the stream; the consequence of which was, that his near hind wheel was caught by some of the wheels of the carriages going in the opposite direction, and he began, much to the astonishment both of his horse and himself, to be slowly dragged backwards. He roared, he shouted, he shook his reins, and he double thonged his unfortunate animal, but all in vain. Back—back—back he went, ever and anon, resting a while in his retrograde motion, as one carriage shook him off, and for the brief space that was allowed him till that which followed took him up again; and then always renewing his retrogradation with the effect of some piece of machinery that has a regular intermittent action, until his cries grew fainter and fainter by distance, and his bulky figure, in furious gesture, finally disappeared from our eyes around the turning of the street.

A polite and hospitable hint had been conveyed to us, that, although the banquet was necessarily abandoned, there would yet be dinner at the castle for those who should come to partake of it. We tried in vain for a corner where we could have a morsel of bread and cheese and a glass of ale in Irvine. This therefore seemed to be a question between turtle and champagne on the one hand, and starvation on the other. But believing, from the appearance of the weather, that the Tournament could not possibly be continued next day, and therefore concluding that the whole game was up, we thought it more prudent to retreat; and, accordingly, we ordered our servants to give up the beds they had engaged for us, and to get the carriage, that we might immediately proceed to Ayr, in order to return to the place from whence we came. As our prognostications as to weather were sufficiently realized by the heavy rain that fell where we were, without interruption, the whole of the ensuing day, we were the more satisfied with the wisdom of our determination; and repentance only came too late, when we afterwards learned, to our great mortification, what we were at too great a distance to learn in time, that the Tournament again proceeded on the Friday, which turned out a most beautiful day. We are, therefore, reduced to the necessity of giving an account of what we did not see, from the information of a friend.

As a proof how much the spectacle of Wednesday had been appreciated, it is enough to mention, that notwithstanding the fearful rain which unceasingly fell on Thursday, so many thousands had crowded to the scene of action, that Lord Eglinton, with his wonted courtesy and attention to the people, felt it necessary to ride down to the lists in person, to acquaint them that no Tournament could be held that day. Yet thousands continued to loiter on the ground; and as the evening brightened up, their hopes brightened with it. Nor were they altogether disappointed; for the Earl, eager to gratify those of all ranks, who had come from all quarters of the three kingdoms to witness the spectacle, resolved, with his companions, that, foul or fair, it should hold on Friday; and kindly rode about the park himself, to acquaint the people with this determination, whilst messengers were despatched in all directions to spread the news. This second day then passed off with an accession of eager expectation for the morrow; whilst within the walls of the castle there was some amusing skirmishing in the ball-room among the knights; who donned their armour, and four taking the title of Knights of the Apple on one side, assailed four who chose to rejoice in that of Knights of the Pear on the other. So distinguished, they hammered at one another with broomsticks, for the entertainment of the ladies, till one would have thought that the forges of the armourers were at work. So tremendous was the fracture of shafts in this encounter, that the housemaids were compelled to send to Irvine and Ayr for a complete new establishment of brooms ere they could accomplish the sweeping of the apartments. On this occasion, Prince Louis Napoleon Bonaparte and Mr Charles Lamb had a course together of tilting on foot, in which the latter was declared to have the advantage. In the evening there was a ball.

On the Friday the weather seemed to be determined to make up to Lord Eglinton for the unruffled good humour with which he had borne the disappointment it had occasioned him on the previous days. Nothing could be more beautiful than the sunshine. To comprehend the splendid effect of the procession of this day, the reader has only to look over the programme and description of that for Wednesday, and then to be told that, in addition to all its magnificence, the Queen of Beauty, and all her ladies, mounted on their palfreys, formed a part of it, together with the lovely body of archeresses in their picturesque green velvet dresses, and with their bows and quivers, making "Cupid's occupation gone," by doing his work for themselves. The dresses of all the different characters which had been out in the wet of Wednesday, had somehow, strange to say, lost none of their lustre. The armour of the knights was again bright, and glittered in the sun, whilst that of the Lord of the Tournament blazed in all eyes. Lord Londonderry wore his collar of the garter, and was attended by the handsome Count Valentine Esterhazy, nephew to the Prince of that name. As the procession entered the lists, and passed deliberately round them, in all its gallant pomp and circumstance, the shouts of the spectators of all ranks, who had assembled in numbers but little inferior to those of Wednesday, were absolutely deafening.

About three o'clock, the business of the day was begun by Lord Glenlyon, the Knight of the Gael, and Lord Alford, the Knight of the Black Lion. They were both unsuccessful in hitting during the two first courses; but, in the third course, the noble Blair-Athol chief shivered his lance upon the shield of his antagonist; and, being declared the victor, he was brought up before the loge of the Queen of Beauty, where he paid his devoirs.

The second joust was an extremely good one between Lord Craven, the Knight of the Griffin, and Captain Fairlie, the Knight of the Golden Lion. Both knights splintered their lances in the first course, which was by all admitted to be the finest exhibition of all the courses that had as yet been run. In that which followed, both knights crossed; but, in the third course, he of the Griffin bore his lance with such precision that he shivered it on his adversary, so that only the small fragment of it below the gauntlet gripe remained in his hand.

The Earl of Eglinton, Lord of the Tournament, then appeared in the lists, with Mr Lechmere, the Knight of the Red Rose. In the first and second careers, both knights failed in touching, but in the third, Lord Eglinton's lance was so truly directed, as to be shivered with great effect upon the shield of him of the Red Rose; and his skill and good fortune so gratified the spectators, that, as he rode up to pay his devoirs, his success was hailed by the loudest acclamations, and by the waving of the handkerchiefs of the women, and the hats and bonnets of the men.

Captain Beresford, the Knight of the Stag's Head, and Mr Little Gilmour, the Black Knight, then ran two courses without effect. In the third, they crossed lances, and again missed in the fourth, so that there was no honour or advantage gained on either side.

The courses that followed between Lord Cassillis, the Knight of the Dolphin, against Mr Lamb, the Knight of the White Rose, and Mr Jerningham, the Knight of the Swan, against Captain Gage, the Knight of the Ram, were spirited, but without result. Lord Waterford, the Knight of the Dragon, and Sir Frederick Johnstone, the Knight of the Border, then ran their due number of careers with great swiftness. In the first, their lances crossed, and the other two were ineffective.

Captain Fairlie, the Knight of the Golden Lion, then appeared in the lists, against Sir Francis Hopkins, the Knight of the Burning Tower. The first course was a failure. In the second, he of the Lion, shivered his lance, and as the third was inefficient on both sides, the Golden Lion was triumphant.

The Lord of the Tournament now announced to the Queen of Beauty, and to the company in her gallery, that the tilting was concluded for the day, but that, if the weather proved favourable, the passage of arms would next day be resumed, a piece of information which was hailed by all who heard it with the loudest plaudits. The tilting was this day inferior, generally, to that of Wednesday, which may have been owing to the fatigue of the ball of the previous night. But now the spectators prepared themselves for the enjoyment of new entertainments.

The riding at the ring, so often mentioned in our ballad story, was the next exercise to which the knights devoted themselves. The ring, of a size just large enough to be borne off on an ordinary lance point, was suspended from a string loosely stretched between two upright poles. One pair of these poles stood immediately opposite to the loge of the Queen of Beauty, and the other pair occupied the similar place on the opposite side of the barrier. The knights and the squires, who also joined in this part of the exhibition, followed one another in succession, and tried to carry off the ring ere they passed through between the poles. The steadiness of hand in levelling the long lances, and the quickness of eye which many of them displayed, were loudly cheered. The performances were altogether excellent, but Lord Eglinton was peculiarly successful. This appears to have been a very lively and gratifying part of the spectacle, and we regret much that we were so unfortunate as to lose it.

Still more do we deplore that we lost that most animating and interesting spectacle that followed—we mean the tourney with the sword—in which four knights, representing Ireland and Scotland, were pitched against four knights who appeared for England. They were as follow:—The Scottish and Irish knights were—

The Earl of Eglinton, Lord of the Tournament,
The Marquis of Waterford, the Knight of the Dragon,
Mr Little Gilmour, the Black Knight, and Viscount Glenalyn, the Knight of the Gael,

Against the following English knights:—

Viscount Alford, the Knight of the Black Lion,
Mr Lechmere, the Knight of the Red Rose,
Mr Lamb, the Knight of the White Rose, and Captain Fairlie, the Knight of the Golden Lion.

The combatants, giving the spurs to their horses, rushed to the encounter at a furious pace, striking at one another with their swords as they passed. The great merit lay in striking two blows on the adversary in passing. But Lords Waterford and Alford were not contented with merely bestowing so small a courtesy on each other; for, turning their horses again to the attack, as if by mutual consent, they assailed each other so desperately, that some of the spectators shouted with delight, whilst others cried out for fear of the consequences. This single combat raged with a fearful raining down of blows, that rang through the lists, and made the fire flash from their arms, till Sir Charles Lamb, the Marshal of the Tournament, hurried forward, and, with some difficulty, parted the combatants. In the general encounter that took place after this, the Honourable Mr Jerningham was severely cut in the wrist: but he was too much of a knight not to appear at the evening's banquet and ball, though we understand that the after consequences of his wound occasioned very considerable alarm to his medical attendant.

The business of this day having been thus concluded, the trumpets summoned the various personages immediately connected with the Tournament to take their places in the procession; and so they returned to the castle, to the sound of martial music, in the same splendid array that they came.

The banquet and ball were held on this evening in the most sumptuous style. The dresses, all correctly of the olden times of chivalry, were more gorgeous than anything that had yet been exhibited; and the rooms were lighted up, if we may so express ourselves, by the blaze of diamonds. Amongst the most brilliantly gemmed of the noble personages present, was the Marchioness of Londonderry, upon whom we had looked with peculiar interest during the first day's Tournament, as her appearance gratefully recalled to us the hospitalities we had received from her father and mother, when she was yet but a girl, in the noble baronial halls of Glenarm Castle. The entertainment of the Lord of the Tournament was altogether princely; and nowhere did his generous disposition and courteous bearing appear to greater advantage, than when he was thus engaged in doing the hospitalities of Eglinton Castle, to one of the most brilliant assemblages of the beauty and birth of our country that ever graced the lordly mansion of any individual. The ball was magnificent, and it was kept up till a late hour; and the badness of the following day prevented the gallant knights from proving, as they doubtless would have done, that the smiles which they received from their fair partners in the mazes of the dance, had given new nerve to their manly aims.

Thus terminated the Eglinton Tournament, for our enjoyment in which, we, as invited guests, are deeply grateful to the nobleman who gave it. We hold that it was a spectacle which all who had any taste or feeling for the more ancient history of Europe, must have considered as by far the most animating, interesting, and instructive that has ever been exhibited in Great Britain in modern times ; and which is destined, if we mistake not, to furnish a spirited theme for the poet, and subject for the painter, for many a day to come. For our parts, we cannot hope to behold anything like it again, unless the most noble the Marquis of Waterford, the bold Knight of the Dragon, or some other such man of metal, by which we mean vulgar coin as well as chivalresque spirit, shall be disposed to renew the sight at some future time, and at some other place. Whensoever and wheresoever it may be, our earnest petition is, that we may be spared to behold it ; and if health and strength be permitted us, it shall not be the rains of a second deluge, —yea, even like that of the Moray Floods— that shall prevent us from being present.

The following individuals were among those who were invited to the banquet and balls at the castle :—

Prince Louis Napoleon Bonaparte, the two Counts Esterhazy, the Duke and Duchess of Montrose, the Duke of Sutherland, the Marquis of Abercorn, the Marquis and Marchioness of Ailsa, the Marquises of Breadalbane and Douglas, the Marquis and Marchioness of Londonderry and daughter, the Marquis and Marchioness of Queensberry, and the Marquis of Waterford ; the Earl and Countess of Charleville, the Earls of Cassillis, Craven, and Fife, Earl and Countess of Dunmore, Earl of Leven and Melville, the Countess Dowager of Listowel, the Countess of Mexborough, and the Earls of Suffolk and Zetland ; Viscounts Alford, Chelsen, Drumlanrig, Ingestrie, Kelburne, and Maidstone ; Lord and Lady Belhaven, Lord and Lady STANZAS ON THE DEATH OF LADY FLORA HASTINGS.

She 's no more ! within the lonely tomb
Her aching heart at length finds peace and rest ;—
A rest as calm as when in childhood's bloom,
In bliss she slumbered on her mother's breast.
And Royal tears are shed around her grave ;
And England's voice hath sounded like a dirge ;
When Flora's corpse across the dark blue wave
Was borne along above the foaming surge.

Words, ye are weak when Pity could desire
Your aid to soothe the aged mother's woe ;
To quell the noble brother's wrathful ire,
At joys decayed, and brilliant hopes laid low.

To them we say not, "Mourners cease to weep."
Ah, no ! Still grieve beside the lost one's bier ;
But feel, while gazing on her marble sleep,
No thought of vengeance must be cherished here.
Oh, when, brave noble, thy proud heart shall burn
At this dark deed, let angry feelings cease ;
And kneeling near thy Flora's sacred urn,
Forgive her foes : she resteth now in peace.
This Christian pardon is the only balm
Which angels pour on wounded souls like thine.
Think on these words till wrathful feelings calm—
"To err is human ; to forgive divine."

ROSAMOND.

LINES.

BY J. WALKER ORD, ESQ.

THE choral trumpet and the festive song,
Mirth's dulcet notes, and Pleasure's gaudy trains,
Youth's joyous sports, the Bacchanalian throng,
Masqued revelry, and music's lengthened strains,—
These soothe the worldling and allay his pains ;
But I, who from the Muses have my dower,
Feel loftier pleasures, more ennobling cares :

The mountains bring me songs of might and power,
And spirit voices swell the evening airs—
For hymns immortal wait on him who dares.
Then weep not, O ye Poets !—Weep no more—
The midnight winds bring music, and ye hear
Tidings of gladness in the ocean's roar,
And striding unfelt on earth, are ever murmuring near !

TRANSLATED POETRY.

THE GARDENER AND THE SHEPHERDESS.

From la Pastorella e il Gardinere.

"O bella pastorella
Che fate qui soletta"

O bonny pastorella !

What do you here alone,
A treading down the herbage
With earliest dew-drops strown ?
Say, would you do the favour
To hear one word from me ?
What joy, my simple-hearted one,
That word would give to thee !
Beautiful colour,
Fragrant odour,
My blooming pink,
Who wills to buy.

I come, O gardinere !

To lead my fleecy throng—
My sportive kids and lambskins—
The valley flowers among ;
To seek the greenest pastures,
By waters flowing clear,
So do not keep me waiting,
I may not tarry here.

Would you accept the tribute,
The infant flower I bring,
Still budding, just unfolding,
Rich in the prime of Spring ;
But newly have I gather'd it,
Fresh-blooming, opening sweet,
I come with hope and cheerfulness
To lay it at your feet.

Beautiful colour, &c.

The gift, indeed, is handsome,
And kind it were in you
To bring this bonny flowret
Fresh moisten'd by the dew.
But thousands bloom around me,
The wildings of the field,
They only wait my gathering,
A richer joy to yield.

Ah ! do not you despise me
Because you deem me old ;
I feel robust and stout enough
To trim my garden's mould.
For that, my sweet pastora,
To take it would you deign,
With its delicious odour,
Content you must remain.
Beautiful colour, &c.

Old man, I do not scorn you,
Nor would I shew you slight,
The sun that smiles in morning
May sink in gloom at night.
But age, to keep its honours,
Must act to wisdom's plan ;
Love will not strew its roses
Upon a fading man.

Say, would you have another,
I give the jessamine,
And with its richer fragrance,
New raptures would be thine.
If that will not suffice thee,
My heart—I lay it down ;
For thou art all its warmth, love—
Without thee life is flown.
Beautiful colour, &c.

In you 'twere wiser, nobler,
To think upon your end ;
Even had you manhood's vigour,
I could but call you friend.

There is a young pastoré,
Of all our swains the pride ;
He is my joy and glory,
My heart owns none beside.

THIRTEEN AT TABLE.

From the French of Beranger.

Good Heavens ! thirteen at table sitting !
Before me too the salt is spilt ;
A fatal number ! presage fitting !
Death comes—I tremble as with guilt.
It comes ! but, lo ! in woman's guise,
With youthful glance, with smile to cheer ;
Come, let the song of joy arise—
No, friends, no more of death I fear.

As she invited here had been,
With wreathed flowers crown her head—
Let nothing on her brow be seen
But the bright hues their beauties shed.
To me she shews a broken chain,
A sleeping child her breast doth bear ;
Come, fill my empty cup again—
No, friends, no more of death I fear.

"Dost dread me," (thus her voice is borne),
"The twin of Hope—the child of Heaven ?
My coming ought the slave to mourn,
When by my touch his chains are riven ?
Fall'n souls ! I clothe ye with the wings
Of which your fate deprives ye here :"
Come ! take the kiss that beauty brings,
For I no more of death will fear.

"I come," she says, "and give thy soul
The power to course through worlds sublime—
Those spheres of light which yonder roll,
With which God strews the path of time.
Great as thy present toil and strife
The happiness that waits thee there"—
Let pleasure bless in peace our life—
No more, my friends, of death I fear.

The house-dog's low and mournful cry
My vision broke, and all was gloom ;
Ah ! man, a vain retreat you try
From the first coldness of the tomb !
Gay passengers upon the wave,
Which nought from its abyss can save,
Quick then let loose the boat—divide the cable—
Our vessel to its fated port must steer.
But while God counts us, though, "Thirteen at Table,"
No more, my friends, no more of death we'll fear.

THE VINE.

From Herder.

'Mid the tenants of the wood,
When in early youth they stood,
While the cedar and the palm,
Strove t' engross the breeze's balm,
While the myrtle and the pine,
First in beauty, burned to shine,
Lowly mourned the vine alone,
In a sad complaining tone ;
Sighed for branches, stem, and fruit,
Sinking, then, to earth, was mute.
Soon the earth's divinity,
Friendly man, approached to see
What declining plant did crave
For his helping power to save.
Quick he raised the slender tree,
His own fondling dear to be,
Turned it to his own loved bower,
Amid many a garden flower.
Now the sun, with kindling heat,
Mellows purple clusters sweet ;

3 M

Now the Vine, its blessings known,
No more weeps nor sighs alone ;
But prized beyond each forest tree,
Hails its own fertility.

STERN WINTER.

From the German of Burger.

Stern Winter, with unsparing hand,
Hath stripped the poplar tall ;
Hath robbed the vernal garb of May
From woods and meadows all ;

Hath buried flowerets, blue and white,
Together in the grave—
Not beauty, grace, nor innocence,
Could rose or lily save.

Yet hope not, tenants of the tomb,
From me a funeral strain—
I know a face whereon ye bloom,
Where ye for ever reign.

Blue is the pupil of her eye,
Her forehead pearly white,
Her mouth as precious ruby red,
Her step as fairy light.

Her breath is like the vernal air,
With varied odour sweet,
Where fragrance of the hyacinth
And blushing violets meet.

Full as the purple strawberry,
Refreshing as the dew,
The kiss so maidently bestowed
With smiles for ever new.

O May! what do I care for thee,
Queen of the flowery grove ?
The charms of Spring survive in her
The gentle maid I love.

MOTLEY.

THE HORSEMAN'S SONG.

Körner.

Up, up my gallant steed, arise !
We'll find a world of freedom yet,
Although the foeman's cunning tries
An ambush round our path to set.
Come, bear thee well, my noble steed !
The oak-wreath beckons from the plain ;
Stretch on ! stretch on ! and with me speed
Into the battle's storm again.

It joys the daring horseman's mood
Swift spurring o'er the field to go ;
It never checks his mantling blood
To see who writhe in dust below :
Behind him all he fights to save—
His home, his child, his wife adored ;
Before him—freedom or a grave ;
And in his hand—his sword.

He goes unto a bridal feast,
A marriage garland his to wear ;
And should he tarry in the least,
Our brotherhood he may not share ;
For HONOUR is the marriage guest,
The bride our father-land,
Who clasps her fondly to his breast,
Has dared 'gainst Death to stand.

Soft, should he fall, his rest will be,
A glorious slumber his, to prove,
Her arms shall fold him tenderly,
And o'er his sleep shall watch her love ;
And when the oak-branch, in the spring,
Shall with its leaflets deck the spray,
Proudly a wreath she'll o'er him fling,
While he in freedom's world doth stray.

So who may stand, or who may fall,
Upon the trodden field of fate,
On whom the battles chance may call,
We calmly can await ;
Though one in German freedom's fight
Into the grave descend,
While others war in victory's light,
To either lot we bend.

If victory waits us from our Lord,
'Gainst fate let every heart be steel'd ;
Yes ; God's own hand shall guide our sword—
His arm shall hold our shield.
Already rings the battle's sound,
So, up my gallant horse, awake !
Though all the devils hemm'd us round,
Yet through them should'st thou break.

ADDRESS TO NATURE.

From the German of Leopold Count of Stolberg.

Sweetest Nature, mother dear !
Lead me on thy way,
As a child, in blythe career,
Boundeth forth to play.

Let me, wearied with delight,
On thy bosom rest,
Breathe the air of fancies bright,
Hanging on thy breast.

Ah ! how charmed am I with thee !
Life's endearing stay ;
Sweetest Nature comfort me,
Lead me on thy way.

MOTLEY.

From the German of Hölty.

Strew ye roses on the way,
Banish every sorrow,
While ye live, enjoy to-day,
Heedless of the morrow.

How the youth, in joyous dance,
Sports the hours away ;
To-morrow waves his funeral wreath—
Emblem of decay.

To-day the bride the altar seeks,
With marriage robes adorned—
To-morrow rests she on her bier,
By weeping husband mourned.

Give all sorrow to the winds,
Clash the goblets round,
Taste life's fruits, while yet ye may,
With vine chaplets crowned.

SONNET.

COMPARISON BETWEEN THE CHARACTERS OF THE- MISTOCLES AND CORIOLANUS.

Translated from the Italian of Abbot Vivianse.

Two cities full of black ingratitude,
Towards two mighty heroes cast them forth,
And victims to the furious multitude,
Athens and Rome proscribed them in its wroth.
One exile, trampling upon nature's ties,
Sought, monstrous, to enslave his native Rome.
The other to his thankless land replies,
" May God defend her, Athens has my home."
He, to escape a foreign dwellingplace,
Nor harm his country, drank the poisoned bowl,
And struck with wonder has each Persian soul.
Coriolanus, stained with deep disgrace
Of treachery, received the charm desired ;—
The other as a citizen expired.

THE ORGANIST.

BY THE LATE JOHN GALT.

ONE day, while walking towards a neighbouring town, my attention was arrested by a young man, with an organ on his back, travelling in the same direction. He was carolling, unconsciously, as it were, with considerable musical pathos, the following rude Italian ditty :—

My country, my parent !—O mother, austere !
How I did love thee, did love thee in heart :
Was not my fervent vow ever sincere,
Ne'er from thy glory nor danger to part ?
I that so swore to die for, mother, thee !
Nor witness the dying of thy liberty.
Queen of the stars, O day that is past !—
O goddess ! to whom still in worship the old
Do homage in spirit, why am I thus cast,
Unshelter'd and lonely to perish in cold ?
Proud parent ! when Fortune was smiling and free,
I serv'd thee for love ; now I earn poverty.

When he had finished, he sat down on a dwarf wall by the road-side, apparently to rest, with so much of the air pensieroso, that I was irresistably induced to speak to him ; and the following conversation arose :—

“ My father's country,” said he, “ was Asti, in Piedmont ; but Io, Io sono Romano”—(I, I am a Roman.)

Something in the generous arrogance with which he uttered the unusual Io, caused me to prick up my ears ; and I inquired how that had happened.

“ Ah, signore,” he replied, “ it is the way of the world : One born to greatness does not always enjoy it. I saw the King of France guillotined : a ladrone (a thief) would not have been so used in paese mio”—(my country.)

The manner of this observation interested me still more than the lordliness with which he had pronounced Io sono Romano ; and I inquired, with a slight inflection, almost of pity, in my voice, if his father had been born to greatness.

He contemplated me, perhaps, the space of a minute, and then replied, with a degree of simplicity exceedingly affecting, by the helpless childishness of the look and tone with which he expressed himself :—

“ He was born to be a marchese ; but his father lost all his money by cards in Turin ; and his mother, una donna superba, (a noble woman,) died of weeping. Signore, the marchese, then married the daughter of a vine-dresser ; and my father, with his brother, ran away to Genoa, where they found a vessel which brought them to Livorno. They landed very hungry ; so he left his brother weeping on the wharf, with a crowd of boys around him, and came away with an English milady to Rome. My father and his brother were then dressed like the sons of the signori of Asti !”

It is not easy to convey an idea of the beauty with which this was said. The speaker might be turned of twenty ; but the pathos with which he spoke, was, as if memory had reconverted him into boyhood. I would do injustice to my own feelings, were I to say that it only awakened my curiosity to hear a little romance.

I know not whether he perceived the effect he had produced, but again he looked in my face as I said—

“ And what became of your father's brother ?”

“ Chi sa !” (who knows !) said he ; “ perhaps he went into paradise. I think he must, for I have heard my father say he was too good for this world.”

“ And your father,” I added, really with emotion ; “ what became of him ?”

“ He lived with the signora while she remained at Rome,” replied the pensive organist. “ By her he became known to many grand persons ; and, when she went away, he was taken into the palace of Cardinal Albano. Every one pitied him ; and when they spoke to him, it was as to a young marchese, though he was but a servitore. Ah ! signore, there is always cold in the heart of those who have been born to hope, and must live with despair.”

The elegance and elocution of this little sentence would have done honour to the celebrated Alfieri, a native of Asti ; and, though I saw but the seeming of a poor wandering organist before me, my imagination was excited, and I thought of the many shapes which the proteus genius assumes. Controlling, however, the perturbation which I could not suppress, I requested him to tell me the history of his father, adding, that I hoped he was not allowed always to remain a menial.

Again, with that pathetic inquisition of the eye which had first induced me to address him, the organist said—

“ Nobody before has asked me about my father : I hope, signore, you are not of the police. Indeed it is truth that I am but a poor stranger just come from Dublin, where they are all so poor themselves that they could only listen to my benedetto organ—sono senza danari”—(they have no money.)

“ Be not afraid,” was my answer ; “ I am like yourself—a stranger here. Were there no inquiries ever made about your father ?”

“ Ah, no,” said he ; “ when men become poor, their friends wish them dead, and willingly think them so when they do not see them. Asti is far away from Rome. My father was not a Rumoroso ; he could not laugh ; so, in the Cardinal's palace he fell lower and lower ; for he was very thoughtful—always sad—and at last no one heeded him ; but he never forgot the castle of his forefathers.”

“ Who was your mother ?”

"Oh, she was like the holy virgin—so calm, so beautiful, so good, and so kind—Adorata, adorata, Dea del mio core!" there is no sorrow in my tears when I think of her. Often, when I sit alone in the twilight, I see her, with my heart, as one of the blessed. She was the daughter of an apostolic fisherman. She resided with her parents on the sea-shore, not far from a villa belonging to the Cardinal, where my father was a domestic. Being alone in the world, he took her for his wife. O madre mia! the spirit of the blessed was in her person. But I shall never see her in this world again."

"Why?" I exclaimed, affected by the singular sense, as it were, of absent objects, to which the evidently gifted but uneducated youth seemed liable.

"I am seeking my brother," replied he; "and, till I have found him, I have made a vow in the church of St John the Theologian, never to return. Padre mio, madre, sono in paradiso. Giovanni e Deo fanno il mondo per me—" (my father and mother are all dead. Giovanni and God are the world to me.)

I perceived that it was in vain to expect a connected narrative; the sensibility with which the temperament of the friendless foreigner was so evidently saturated, and the tears which began to flow from him, as he remembered his home, were quite irresistible.

Whatever were his mental endowments, his power of pathetic utterance was truly extraordinary; and I could not but strongly sigh when I thought how much the refined world had probably lost of delight, by the mendicity of one who would have been such an ornament to the opera.

When his emotion had a little subsided, I inquired what he meant by seeking his brother.

"My father," replied he, "died when we were small children. We were four—two sisters, and brother Giovanni. My sisters were younger, and brother elder than me. My mother! how she caressed us when father died. The love that she then shed in tears is ever glowing in my bosom. We became very poor, and Giovanni, when he was not ten, went into Rome, when, as we heard, he travelled away into England with an organist. My sisters, the one after the other, when bambini, (babes,) were taken into paradise; and my mother then used to sit on the shore, where, often and often, at night, hath she pointed out to me the very star which Maria and Angelina were dancing with happiness within; and she would then kiss me, and pray that we might soon be there with Maria and Angelina; and, mio padre! her heart was dying then; and, when I was in my ninth year, Jesus Christ stretched down his hand from a star and lifted her up into heaven; so I was left alone in the world. Then it was that I went to the church of St John the Theologian, and made a vow to wander away till I found Giovanni; and I have never forgotten my vow."

"Gracious! you, then, so young, and have still abided by that vow?"

"You know, signore," said he, looking intently in my face, "that it would be a sin to forget my vow; I durst never, then, hope to join madre mia in cielo—" (my mother in heaven.)

"But surely," cried I, "you have not, since then, been always in search of your brother?"

"I have not been always; but I have never forgotten my vow, nor done anything but to enable me to fulfil it."

"In what way?"

"The servants of the cardinal, when he went back to Rome, at the end of the year after my mother had been taken up into paradise, took me with them, and did all they could to tempt me to break my vow, but I would not; so I began to gather money to buy this organ, and they helped me. I beseeched, with its sadness, the world to let me pass into England, where I hope to find Giovanni; but I have not yet heard of him. I have been wandering up and down for three years, and I can hear nothing of him; nor is he in Dublin. Perhaps, signore, you can tell me if he be in Scozia. He has a black mole on his cheek, and his eyes are the colour of pleasure."

It seemed to me as if there was a more tender beauty in this ineffectual search, than even in the celebrated quest of Telemachus; and I became curious to know with what feeling he had been so long such a solitary and sentimental wanderer.

He had visited many countries; but his mind was so absorbed by one idea—the fulfilment of his vow—that he had seen nothing which, in any great degree, interested him, but the execution of the unfortunate Louis. The ornaments of nations had never awakened his attention. He spoke of the Alps, however, with something indeed of enthusiasm—Hanno una spetto come l'idio—"They look like God," said he. Paris left no impression; even the magnificent greatness of London seemed only to be remembered as another town. But, when I asked what he thought of it as compared to Rome, he exclaimed, with glistening eyes—

"Roma, ah, Roma! who has seen her may desire to die. There is but Rome upon all the earth. The stones there are stories, and the dust antiquity. It is only there, and by the basilica of St Pietro, that you can guess the glory that may be in paradise. Methinks I hear the fountains, in front of the basilica, singing matins, and the voice of Time in the moonlight silence of the Colosseum. Roma, O Roma! Parent of Glory! There are but Heaven and Rome; all else is the rubbish of from what they were made of."

* This cannot be translated. I give the sentiment—Goddess of my heart!

REYNOLDS' MODERN LITERATURE OF FRANCE.

SAVE from the unmeasured abuse of some of the periodicals, the people of England know little of the light literature of Young France. We are far from thinking that the censure of those loose, corrupting, or morbid works is wholly undeserved; but, as it is satisfactory to understand the grounds of so sweeping a condemnation of the imaginative literature of a great and highly civilized nation, a work like the present has important uses. It will clear our way to give Mr Reynolds' book a more just and specific title than that which he has assumed. It consists of specimens of living authors, not always very happily selected, if the object were to please the tastes of the English readers; but on the whole, exhibiting a true picture of the vicious and morbid character of modern French fiction, whether in romance or the drama. This is intermixed with slender accounts of the different popular authors, and highly laudatory criticism.

With the exception of the writings of La Martine, and a few of the novels of Paul de Kock, the English public know little or nothing of those dramas, fictions, and light works. Notre Dame de Paris, Victor Hugo's masterpiece, has had a partial success in England; but the popular Paul de Kock, who may be styled the Dickens of the Badauts of Paris, as the latter is the idol of the Londoners, is scarcely to be classed with the romanticists, and the new race of French writers of the Intense school. The life and manners which he paints, if vicious and licentious, are, we fear, only too true to the originals around him; and if more coarse and indecent than many of his brethren, we should yet hesitate to pronounce him, by any means, the most pernicious of the modern school.

If we have been compelled to denounce the Gallican taint perceptible in some of our home literary productions, how shall we deal with those works in which the pollution is undisguised, the poison undiluted? Those in which, according to Mr Reynolds, the authors "paint the truth in all its nudity"—those who, in developing the secrets of nature, "shock the English reader, because he is not as yet accustomed to so honest a style." Long may he retain this false delicacy, false modesty, national prejudice, or whatever the name may be, for that sanctifying sentiment which makes the heart recoil, and shrink from the horror of contemplating that "truth in all its nudity," which is no more like the naked truth of nature than, to borrow the words of Hume, "the shameless exposure of a prostitute in a brothel is to the nakedness of a savage." We deny that it is the "nudity of nature" that is exhibited in those depraved and depraving fictions; although it were decent, or wise, or possible, among sane persons, that this should always be exposed. Nature, in naked simplicity, is painted in the country girl Pamela, in the family group of the Vicar of Wakefield, in Effie Deans,

Mysie Happer, Rose Bradwardine, and the Bride of Lammermoor; and the reader delights in the exquisite display of what is at once true and lovely. In the French romances, on the contrary, "the nudity of nature" is the unblushing exposure of the workings of the lowest and fiercest animalism, in minds already deeply tainted, if not utterly depraved and perverted. But, admitting the metaphysical subtlety displayed in the analysis of passion, and the truth of the morbid mental anatomy of these works, is this the proper or worthy office of a humanizing and refining literature? One of our poets says, that the Deity spares all eyes save those of Omniscience the sight of that hideous thing a human heart; this is exaggerated; but there is, nevertheless, truth in the idea. How many diatribes have been thundered forth against the evils and pollutions that attend the practice of auricular confession. But these novels make the author the Father Confessor, gloating over tales of the foulest, blackest crime, over monstrous conceptions engendered by a depraved imagination and guilty mind; and dwell upon, and eloquently proclaim to the world, the secrets of the dark confessional. Evil which may come and go into the heart of man "unapproved"—thoughts which are smothered and stifled, and driven from the haunted mind with horror, which the wife durst not reveal to her husband, the daughter to her mother, the sister to her sister, without the violation of whatever is most pure and holy in human nature—are here dwelt upon, exaggerated, and made the theme of the most eloquent and brilliant writing. English novels and histories "tell but half the story of a man's life," says Mr Reynolds; while in France, "the whole tale is given at once." They go the whole hog, and beastly enough is the result. But English fictionists tell all that it can be either pleasurable or profitable to tell, and, some of the best of them, probably a little more. "We do not become robbers because we read of thefts," says he; "but are our principles of honesty strengthened by the study," is the question more to the point. "Nor does a female become incontinent on account of her knowledge that such a failing exists." But, we ask, Where is the necessity of initiating her, by book, into a species of knowledge at which, however carefully educated, she must arrive early enough? Innocent ignorance may not be virtue; but neither does virtue consist in the knowledge that vice exists. Where is the utility of tainting the virgin purity of the soul, of awakening it from the happy dreams of youthful innocence to the knowledge of evil before the time? Young women might certainly learn much from these romances, which neither English nor yet French girls could learn from their mothers; but we strongly question the utility of this species of precocious knowledge. The audacity "of giving the whole tale;" or, in other words, telling whatever is conceived by an impure and unrestrained imagination, as the truth of life; being one leading principle in the composition of Modern French novels; another is to trample under foot, to scout at, what in books is called poetic justice in the developement of fictitious history. Now, if this new canon merely upset the ancient vulgarity of the good boy getting the sugar-plum—the chaste and tried prudent damsel obtaining the rich lord for her husband, and the coach and six; we should at once recognise its truth and propriety; but in these books a superintending, benevolent Providence seems blotted from the scheme of life; Vice is exhibited as successful and triumphant, by its own unscrupulous audacity; while Virtue, possessing no inherent grandeur or force, sinks, and is overwhelmed by the mere brute force of circumstances. This cannot be the canon of a sound literature. Poetic justice, the final triumph, or the visible inherent superiority of Virtue, requires, perhaps, in English literature, to be placed on a broader as well as a more elevated basis; one comprehending the intrinsic as well as the extrinsic and adventitious, the future as well as the past, immortality as well as life. We have no objection to see cheerful self-sustaining Virtue trudging a-foot, and haughty Vice rolling by in her blazing chariot, if Virtue is all the while presented clear, and strong, and happy, in the conviction of her inherent dignity and superiority, as concerns even this life; and either in possession of the “sweet peace which goodness bosoms ever,” or of that faith which gives assurance of ultimate triumph; of that grandeur of mind which can “look down and pity kings.” But to this extent poetic justice must be regarded as an essential element in all healthy and purifying imaginative literature. The understanding, and the natural sentiments of humanity, alike demand it. To deny it is practical atheism.

Mr Reynolds asserts that the prevailing notion of the indecency of French novels, has arisen from the coarseness of the tales of the very popular, and really clever and sprightly, Paul de Kock. But the truth is, that French novels, according to those English ideas, which we regard as correct, have always been indecent; and many of them far more licentious and corrupting than De Kock's coarse if truthful portraiture. Among the moderns, it is fortunately not the most popular writer who is the most pernicious. His books are, we have said, but too faithful pictures of the vicious and licentious every-day life of multitudes in the great French cities; of things which it may not be greatly for the edification of the young to dwell upon, any more than on our own Tom and Jerry's, Newgate Calendars, and the accounts of thieves, ruffians, and their haunts and slang, which form the delight of a portion of our own populace. But, in the delineations of Paul de Kock's more ambitious and eloquent contemporaries, the imagination and inventive faculty are racked to portray depravities which taint and corrupt, to the core, young minds of a better educated and naturally higher order, and without offensively outraging what, in France, is considered the line of decency in manners. If De Kock—whose popularity is undoubtedly no sign of the purity or refinement of the morals and taste of the French people, any more relatively, than the popularity of his English counterparts is of the growing refinement of the English people—be the most popular of all living French writers, he is neither the most fascinating nor dangerous. Educated foreigners seem to divide their admiration pretty equally between the mysterious “man-woman,” Madame Dudevant, alias George Sand, and Victor Hugo. Even the fastidious Mrs Trollope, who abhors to rancour everything ultra-liberal or “un-English,” has allowed herself to be led away by the profundity and brilliancy of this nondescript alleged birth of the Revolution of the Barricades. The fascination of Mr Reynolds, who is, a somewhat indiscriminate admirer of whoever he describes, need therefore the less surprise us. To the equivocal Baroness he ascribes literary excellence of all kinds, and in the highest degree. Alas, that her eulogist should be compelled to say that the most celebrated of her novels is so pronounced by her countrymen, “because it is the most pernicious,” “a tale devoid of one single feature to recommend it,” “a hellish compound of poisonous drugs, combined together for the purpose of forming a draught which may instil a slow poison into the veins of those who luxuriate in it.” This ought to be quite decisive of what should be Mr Reynolds' judgment of “this immortal and extraordinary writer,” “this woman of a million passions,” who “has yielded to the exigencies of her nature, and sought that consolation with another which she could not find in him who was her legal protector.” Mr Reynolds is unfortunate in his specimen of the peculiar style of George Sand's writings. Painful and offensive enough in its subject, it conveys no very exalted idea of the “man-woman's” brilliant powers. Like some other great erratic actors, the titular Baroness seems quite as much an object of vulgar admiration and curiosity, from her unsexed character and habits, and her general audacity of manners, as from her real talents. The account of the fictions of George Sand is meagre, and the estimate of their merits as vague as is the author's opinion of the character of Madame Dudevant's genius.

BALZAC is the writer next in order. We should have premised that, by an extraordinary theory, Mr Reynolds imputes all the power and freshness of modern literature—its revival, to use a phrase of the day—to the Revolution of 1830, with about as much justice as the Quarterly Review imputes its licentiousness to the same fertile cause—the expulsion of the elder Bourbons; and, by reaction, the licentiousness of manners to the prevailing literature. According to the one, the exile of Charles X. evolved the genius of George Sand, and gave the mind of Balzac a wider scope; according to the other, it converted the French people, in one week, into a nation of debauchees and abandoned women. The one is about as near the truth as the other. The secret of Balzac's great though tardy popularity was, it appears—his propitiating beauties on the wane—a numerous class—by choosing for his heroine, and the name of one of his tales, "The Woman of Thirty Years." The specimen of De Balzac selected, is a criminal trial, in which the interest hangs on the obscurity and conflicting nature of the evidence. It would require no great effort to equal this story in the ordinary current English literature of the day, which serves its end, and is heard of no more. SUE, the French Marryat or Cooper, is next produced; but when will a Frenchman equal a Briton on his own element, the ocean? He may, however, write very good sea-novels for the Parisian boudoirs. A specimen of Fredric Soulie's powers, "The Tale of the Park Gate," is more favourable. It is redolent of the modern chivalry of France—the chivalry of intrigue. Mr Reynolds might as well have passed La Martine, who does not belong to the modern French school. He gives, nearly complete, a translation of one of Dumas' most popular and finest dramas. Yet how revolting is Angèle, in spite of its beauty and pathos, to English—we would fain say and believe, and to French feeling!

The specimen of Auguste Ricard's wit and humour—Ricard, the imitator, and almost the rival of Paul de Kock, as Mr Reynolds, the author of "Pickwick Abroad," is of Dickens—is trivial enough, or no more than could be matched every day in those slighter sketches in the English periodicals, which pass at once into oblivion. But Ricard's works must have value, if "they form a complete library of sketches of French manners and customs," admitting that they are sketches of customs which ought to be made known, and which deserve to be perpetuated in literature. Mr Reynolds is, on the whole, felicitous in his appreciation and specimens of de Kock. Jean de Paris is his text, a novel, which, with all its coarseness and unconscious profligacy, is redeemed, by great talent and fidelity, to the city, if not to the national character of the middle and lower classes of the French people. The episode selected as a specimen, from "The Husband, Wife, and Lover," is of itself a lively and complete petit comedy. It is, however, only a new version of "The Liar," which, again, is of French origin.

It is as a poet that Mr Reynolds chiefly criticises and gives specimens of Victor Hugo's compositions, for as a poet he admires him most; but, as a poet, the author of the Songs of Twilight is not likely to make any deep impression in this country, though Mr Reynolds is pleased to consider him a greater poet than a novelist; and, as for Hugo's history and personalities, if any one choose to look back on our pages, an account will be found, which, being much fuller and more minute, precludes further notice of him here.

The specimen of the novels of Lacroix, the closing chapter of a novel, is, without exception, the most fiendish, revolting, and disgusting scene ever depicted in words. It is needless to allude to the monstrosity and improbability of this hell-begun in a death-chamber; and we are astonished at the bad taste which dictated its selection, as Mr Reynolds is generally rather chary, knowing the nature of that fastidious animal, John Bull, for whom he is catering. Beranger obtains a brief notice and merited praise; but with the popular poet of France the English reader is already familiar. De Tocqueville lay rather out of our author's way. Another tale of Paul de Kock or of Janin might have better served his purpose than an analysis of Democracy in the United States of America, and speculations on the stability of French political institutions. The most really interesting specimen—a sketch indicating fine original genius—is from the works of Charles Nodier. It is Reminiscences of Jean Francois, or Blue-Stockings; but then it is not French—it is essentially German.

We cannot dip farther into these "devilries." The sketch of Nodier as an author may serve as a specimen of Mr Reynold's manner, which is generally fully as good as his matter:—

Of all French writers, none is so perfectly indifferent to the great reputation which he has acquired by his literary labours as Charles Nodier. He shuns the applause of his friends, and cares not for the favourable opinion of criticism. He wrote originally only to please himself, and was more satisfied when he accomplished that aim than when he had succeeded in pleasing all the world. He is a literary hermit, who knows not that the odour of his sanctity penetrates beyond the confines of his own cell; he is bashful and unobtrusive as a young virgin, who perceives not that the charms of her beauty excite the admiration of all around. He has traced his furrows in all the fields of intelligence, and the harvests have sprung up, and their variegated produce has been distributed amongst men—flowers and fruits for the fair and young, and the more substantial crops for the intellectual and the studious. He has divided his attention amidst all matters of inquiry, study, speculation, and research—he is well versed in all sciences; he is an adorer of the arts; abstruse learning is his delight; and every branch of controversy has been contemplated by him. We might fancy his studies to be a library, a laboratory, a nursery for rare plants, with a shelf for astronomical instruments, a corridor leading out of it for choice pictures, the margins of which are filled with his copious annotations. The versatility of his genius is extraordinary; and his writings bear testimony, not only to the profundity of his knowledge in all matters, but to the extent of his memory—for he introduces allusions or remarks which, though skilfully borrowed from others, still acquire a fresh charm, or renewed point, when clothed in his own peculiar language. Every one has read his romances, and every one has been charmed with the simplicity of his style, the elegance of his diction, the eloquence of his language, and the pathos which he weaves into his narrative. His tales appeal to the inmost feelings of the heart; and, while we peruse them, we seem to be contemplating the different phases of a mind fraught with every virtue, and every sentiment of purity and nobleness.

This is high praise for a modern French novelist; but Nodier is not very French. "He is melancholy even in his gayest moments; and the vivacity which characterises the generality of his countrymen is not to be found in his writings."

There may be abundant fallacy in the statements of the rate of profit derived by popular French writers from their works, which even native Frenchmen can know little about, but we may take Mr Reynolds' information as his guess, and the prevailing rumour of Paris. Madame Dudevant is a constant contributor to the leading French magazines. Her price is a thousand francs (£40 sterling) for an article of sixteen pages. The first edition of her novels produces about £640, and on some novels she stipulates for two francs a volume for all copies sold. Dumas, in a pecuniary view, is the most successful writer of France. Some of his plays have sold for above £3,000; and the sums which, by the law or usage of the country, is paid upon the performance of a drama in every theatre in France, produces him an average income of £340. For every article he writes in the Revue des deux Mondes, he receives £40. Ricard, if less successful, also realizes considerable profits from his novels. He was originally a subaltern officer in the army, and is now much better paid by the booksellers than he ever was by the King.

Mr Reynolds' work, as a whole, may be useful to those who wish to obtain a general if superficial knowledge of the Bulwers, D'Israeli, Jameses, Dickenses, Gores, and Barry Cornwalls of Paris and their ephemeral works. More we cannot say for it.

PEDESTRIAN TOUR OF A SCOTTISH EMIGRANT, IN THE MIDDLE STATES OF AMERICA.

HAVING resumed the use of my feet, I next crossed the Monocessy river, by a rather curious kind of bridge—being a great deal higher at one end than the other, so as to make it down-hill all the way across. It is of three arches, and built of stone, with a most miserable attempt at paving on the top, quite unlike the fine road leading from Baltimore to Fredericktown. I never saw such a bridge before; and, I believe, the contractors have been of the same mind, as at one end they have erected an obelisk, with the year of erection, and some names or inscriptions, which I could not make out, as commemorative of the event.

Fredericktown is a tolerably large place, with considerable business, and situated in a fine country. At the end of one of the streets, I observed a triumphal arch erected in honour of the visits of Lafayette. It consisted of boards painted and larded all over with "All hail!" and such like stuff—not befitting the simplicity and honest downright welcome of Republicans. Lafayette, no doubt, was endeared to the Americans by many sacrifices made, and many services yielded, in what they call the holy cause of freedom; and for such, certainly he deserved a large portion of their gratitude and love; but I think they might have left out, in their hearty welcome to their old and tried friend, such childish and theatrical displays, at which the slaves of the most despotic government of Europe would laugh.

Somewhere along the road, between Baltimore and Fredericktown, is Carrolton, the estate of the late Charles Carrol, a staunch Republican and patriot, and one of the signers of the Declaration of Independence. He was an Irishman by birth, I believe. When I passed along the road, I did not know anything about Charles Carrol, and almost as little about the Declaration, or else I would have called upon the old gentleman—at least I would have taken a good look at the premises. About half a mile beyond Fredericktown, I came up with a young man who was going to within a short distance of Tropton—my destination. He had had the ague, which had taken him into town by way of amusement; and, like the most of patients who have that shaky complaint, to him it was an interesting topic of conversation; and with much reason too, for, as he was one of those shapeless striplings who are troubled with what is called an overgrowth—all legs and no body—a mathematical line—length without breadth—who outgrow all their coats and breeches as fast as the tailor can make them. It would not take a great many shakes to lay his length below ground. He had travelled, too, as far as Harper's Ferry; and, knowing I was going there, he tried to astonish me by a narration of the stupendous sight I should see there. I have now been in Harper's Ferry; and although it is a wonderful place, both in the way of nature and art, yet it does not come up to my tall companion's description—excusable, however, in a lad who had never seen a larger place than Fredericktown, and who, no doubt, like a good many people, wished to make everything as tall as himself.

Between Fredericktown and Troptown, I, for the first time, saw a tobacco-field. To those who have never seen tobacco growing, I may observe, it resembles very much the dock, if it be not actually one, and is planted out in rows like cabbage, about four feet apart every way, and must be kept very clean. When nearly ripe, large blubbery worms attack it; which must be carefully destroyed, or else they would soon leave little for the snuffers, chewers, and smokers. When come to maturity, the whole plant is cut, split up the middle, and hung over something to dry, when it is ready for the manufacturer. It requires a rich soil, and soon impoverishes the ground.

I arrived in the evening at Troptown, or Newton-Trop, as it is sometimes called. It consists of but one long street, and is situated at no great distance from the Blue Ridge. About a mile before arriving at Fredericktown, I had a fine view of the mountains; and, by whatever reason they have attained the appellation of Blue Ridge, to me they certainly appeared to have a bluish cast. The people about Fredericktown call them the Concoctin Mountains. The morning after my arrival, I called at Mr G.'s, who happened to be over in Virginia upon some business. His lady gave me a kind invitation to stay with them until his return; and as the nephew, my old travelling companion, was expected every day, I accepted the invitation in preference to going back to the inn. I stayed with them eight days; when, neither uncle nor nephew making their appearance, I began to be afraid of encroaching upon their hospitality, and in spite of kind remonstrances from Madame G. and the rest of the family, I made preparations for decamping.

During my stay at Tryptown, nothing worth mentioning occurred, except it may be that here I first saw slaves. I had, no doubt, seen plenty of them before this, but I did not know them to be such. All the black individuals I had hitherto seen, not coming up to my idea of slavery, I had set down as free blacks, taking it for granted that I had not got far enough into Maryland to be among the slave population. On the second evening after my arrival, half a dozen negroes came into the store with brooms, &c., to sell. Having completed their sales, one of them asked for fiddle strings; and while the storekeeper was getting them, took up a fiddle which happened to be lying on the counter, and played a tune or two. All of them appeared to be in good health and spirits, well enough dressed for working people, and on familiar terms with the storekeeper. After their departure, I mentioned to the storekeeper my wish to see some slaves, since I had got into a slave country. Why, says he, these blacks who have just left the store are slaves. I was somewhat struck, as I did not expect to see slaves so well dressed, so cheerful, nor so familiar with white men. As I shall resume the subject of negro slavery in a future chapter, I shall merely mention here, that in spite of Sterne's doleful picture of slavery, it is not that awful state of hopeless wretchedness which the Sternes and philanthropists, real and pretended, of the day suppose it to be. On the contrary, there are thousands, and thousands more of free whites, who are actually in a state of degradation and misery, compared with which, the slavery of the southern states is happiness itself.

Ten miles walk or so beyond Tryptown, brought me to the Potomac—a noble river, but with a very rocky channel. I was now about a mile from its passage through the Blue Ridge; through which also my road lay. In proceeding upwards, at a slight turn in the road I perceived a pig or two loitering lazily along. I was not much astonished at that, as it was not the first time I had seen such animals; but, after a short space, another one made its appearance, and another and another, till I began to have some apprehensions about venturing in among so many. I approached as boldly as I could, however, but not without fear; not indeed that they would willingly hurt me, but, as it had been raining for two days past, and as the sun had again broke forth fresh and hot, the pigs being on an expedition from the west to the Baltimore shambles, were determined to be in no great hurry to get their throats cut, but to take as much of the cream of life as they could get in passing along, and were every now and then wallowing in the puddles, and anon starting up suddenly like deaf people who hear something unexpectedly. Pigs, too, have an ugly habit of starting to the wrong side, and going every way but the right one. I had, of course, good reason to be afraid of being knocked over and pigified in the mud. I dashed gallantly in upon the advanced guard, which, after a threatening display of snouts in the air, broke, and spurted aside in all directions like the fragments of a bombshell. I afterwards, for the space of half-a-mile, fought my way manfully through the main body of the army, and, without other damage than some sprinklings of mud, came out at the rear, which, by the by, seemed as much astonished to see me as the van.

On turning a point of rocks, the celebrated pass of the Potomac through the Blue Ridge was full in view. I had been more than once told that it was worth a voyage across the Atlantic to see it. It may be so; but, if true, there must be very little sublime scenery on the other side of the Big Water; and, if I mistake not, the voyager has a great chance of witnessing much sublimer, and more awful scenery, long before he reaches the Blue Ridge. It is assuredly a very grand scene; but, I must confess I was greatly disappointed in it; and all those who have witnessed the windings of this same Potomac, and some of its smaller branches, through the mountainous region of Hardy and Hampshire counties, and Virginia, have been disappointed also. After witnessing the savage and fearful scenes farther up among the Alleghannies, to them the passage of the Potomac is nothing: strangers cannot conceive how there should be so much talk about it. The scene, as I have already said, is very grand; but, to me it appears to lose a good part of its effect upon the mind, by being upon too large a scale. The river is by far too wide, and, of course, the cut ends of the mountain too far apart. If Nature, in some of her freaks, would just hitch the ends three-fourths of the way nearer one another, perpendicularize them a little more, and scatter a few huge rocks into the channel, so as to interrupt the passage of the water, I think it would improve the scene mightily. But, as to accomplish this would require an earthquake, or bouleversement, as the French call it, I don't think the good folks of Harper's Ferry and the adjacent country would thank Nature for it, nor me for giving the advice; so we must let things stand as they are.

Jefferson, in his Notes on Virginia, in the opinion of some compilers of school-books, has given a very sublime description of the above scenery, but, in my humble opinion, a very bombastical and nonsensical one. I don't recollect his words, but he talks of the Potomac on the one side, and the Shenandooh on the other, coming ranging up, and, in the moment of their junction, bursting through the mountain, and, of course, like the Irishman's race-horse, driving all before them. What way rivers may have run before the breaking of these two through the Blue Ridge, I know not; but since that period, their usual method of proceeding has been to range downward. Moreover, when did the Potomac and Shenandooh begin their course? Did they reach the same spot in the Ridge precisely at the same moment? Where are the wrecks of the mountain? It seems to me, that instead of breaking violently through, these rivers have, good-naturedly and quietly, lifted the piece out, and placed it out of their way, where Harper's Ferry now stands; for, if you could suppose the tongue of land upon which that town is situated, placed upon wheels, and wheeled into the gap, it would fill it up neatly. True, it is not so high as the Blue Ridge, by a great deal; but the diminution of height, however, can be very easily, at least very philosophically accounted for.

The point of rocks a little way below the pass, is the place from whence you see the scene to most advantage. Looking up the river, on the left side, you have the Virginia end of the Blue Ridge shelving easily upwards, and covered with trees from top to bottom. On the right side, and nearly straight before you, you have the Maryland end, also covered with trees mixed with precipitous rocks. In the back-ground is Harper's Ferry, which forcibly reminded me of Stirling. True enough, it is not swinging up in the air as high as that town: but still there is a resemblance. The Shenandooh comes down on the left of the town, as the Potomac does on the right. I was informed that, on the end of the mountain, on the Maryland side, an exact likeness of Washington was to be seen, formed by Nature, on the rocks. In getting into the pass I looked narrowly for the portrait, but in vain: I could see no such resemblance; but, as these things require to be viewed from a particular position, perhaps I had not got the right place. There was a house at the Ferry, immediately below the rocks; and how I did not ask at the people I know not; but I have since spoken of the circumstance to some Virginians, who told me they had also looked for it in vain. In all probability it requires a little flight of the imagination to make it out. I don't deny the fact, however. Nature can work wonders. We all know she is a first-rate landscape painter, (paintress;) and I see no reason why she may not sometimes try her hand at portraits. The newspapers, indeed, have but the other day informed us, that, on one of the portico pillars of a new public building in Columbus, Ohio—I think that's the place—Nature has thrown the veins in the stone into a full length portrait and striking resemblance of—I was going to say the immortal—Jackson, but he's mortal yet, and long may the old hero continue so!

I crossed the Potomac in a long kind of flat boat, pushed forward by means of long poles. In company we had a four-horse waggon. The number of these waggons, conveying merchandise from the eastern cities to the western country, is prodigious; but since the introduction of canals and railroads, their number must have considerably decreased. It is astonishing with what tact the waggoners manage their beautiful teams of four, sometimes six horses. They ride postillion on the near wheel horse, and, with a particular kind of pull at their long single rein, make the horses go to one side, while, with another kind of pull, which the animals understand well, they go to the opposite. Those waggoners, who are very proud of their teams, have them gaily caparisoned, and decked out with a multitude of little bells, which make not an unpleasant music as they travel along.

Harper Ferry is but a small place, and the greater part of the town is made up of workshops for the manufacture of fire-arms for the United States. Everything here is kept in good order, and every man about the works has got his own particular piece of the gun to make. I saw here two curious machines: one for rough-turning the gun-stocks, and another for making screws. The ease and despatch with which these machines do their duty, is admirable. Both are American inventions, I believe. The Americans brown all their barrels; and, when finished, they are laid up in boxes, and not placed to view, in various fanciful figures, as I have seen in our arsenals. The Rifle Factory is about half-a-mile up the Shenandooh.

Upon crossing the Potomac, I entered into that division of Virginia called, by way of eminence, the Valley, embracing the tracts of country between the Blue Ridge and Alleghannies; which, taken as a whole, is looked upon as the most fertile portion of the country, and one of the finest in the United States. Lower Virginia lies to the east of the Blue Ridge, the inhabitants of which are called Tuckahoes by the mountaineers. Although the population of Lower Virginia may be looked upon as the real Virginians, the greatest slave-holders, and owners of the largest plantations, yet I never heard the above term applied to them, except as expressive of contempt or inferiority. I never could learn the derivation of the term, nor what it meant; but certainly it meant nothing good, as it was generally coupled with ruffled shirts and poverty. The people among the mountains, however, may be regarded as foreigners, at least as not possessing the pure Virginian blood; and, like all foreigners, they perhaps think themselves something better than the natives; or perhaps, like all mountaineers, they despise their lowland countrymen merely because they are lowlanders. Western Virginia lies among, and east of, the Alleghannies.

In the Valley, the only towns I passed through, after leaving Harper's Ferry, were Charlestown and Winchester. The former is only one long street. It has, however, a well-conducted newspaper. In its neighbourhood is the seat of Judge Washington, the only thing like a gentleman's house I had as yet seen in the country. I remarked, too, a striking peculiarity in the appearance of some of the fields. They were all dotted over with large stones, or rather rocks; and from these, clumps of trees grew, seemingly preferring the spots where there was nothing like nourishment, to the level and fertile soil around them. I have frequently witnessed this partiality since, among the Alleghannies, especially as regards the oaks; some of which I have actually seen growing through a bed of solid rock, and others springing from cliffs where they could not possibly be nourished by anything except rain and the dews of heaven.

Winchester is a handsome county town, with neat streets, an elegant church or two, a bank, an academy, and two newspapers. It also possesses some trade, principally in flour, I believe, there being excellent sites for mills in the vicinity.

About four miles beyond Winchester, I put up at a paltry inn, or house of entertainment, as the Virginians call it; the title of inn-keeper being a little too low for the high-minded Virginians. But whatever they may choose to call their inns, they are—I speak of the bulk of those among the mountains—anything but houses of entertainment; the house itself being generally as dull as an empty church, and not much to be got but peach and apple brandy, strong enough to split your head in two. I met at the door a tall, comely woman; and I asked her how far it might be to the next inn, as I would like to go a little farther yet before sun-down. Indian-like, she answered with an “ugh,” and a withering expression of scorn—a trait which added peculiar beauty to her already fine features. After all, I don’t know if she was wrong; for, although not intended, my question could scarcely be taken any way but as a kind of insult. I might as well have gone to the doctor and asked him where he thought I could find a good doctor. As there was no answer to be got from her, I thought I might as well stay, in preference to going farther, and, maybe, faring worse. But, indeed, worse it could not well be, as I went to bed supperless, and, in the morning, started breakfastless. My purse was now getting fearfully deficient; having in it, after paying for my bed, only one elevenpenny bit. This I reserved to pay for breakfast and dinner, and my last night’s supper to the bargain, intending to knock the whole three into one grand finale, and then trust to Providence for all the other meals that might be yet to come.

Immediately on leaving the inn, I began to ascend the first ridge of the Alleghannies—being first-rate exercise for an empty stomach. I had now left the level country behind me, and was about to enter upon one wild and savage in the highest degree, and to which there was no end, until I reached the Ohio. As may well be guessed too, the roads, except some short pieces, here and there, changed materially for the worse. One peculiarity attending the Alleghannies is, their running in regular ridges, with intervening valleys, cut in all directions by lesser ranges, or spurs, as they are called. Among them, the traveller is much the same as if he were crossing the Atlantic, upon one large wave, and down another; or rather, as if we were going from one side of London to the other, not by carefully threading his way through the streets, but by climbing over the house tops at the nearest. I got along, however, pretty well, although my road, at times, was somewhat steep, and the dwellings few and far between; the novelty of the scenery, and the anticipation of always something new a-head, carried me along in good spirits, notwithstanding the emptiness of my purse and stomach.

People may talk of poverty as they choose—of its pinching, grinding nature, and so forth; but I, who have been used to it for half my lifetime, can tell a different story. I have always found, that the poorer I got, the happier I became; and the less of this world I had to care for, the lighter was my heart: in fact, among the Alleghannies I got quite sublimated; and, although it may well be supposed that the pure mountain air helped a good deal, yet I cannot help thinking that the lightness of my pockets helped much more. My spirits began to boil over like a tumbler of soda water; and I tripped up one side of the hill, and trotted down the other, just as if I had left all my cares down below in the low country. And true enough too; for although I had got into a high and mountainous country, I had also got to the bottom of Fortune’s wheel; which, if it moved at all, must move for my good. I feared no laws, had broken none, nor had I the intention of breaking any. I cared not for robbers, because I had nothing to be robbed of. I had no trouble, as I had left my trunk, and all my worldly effects, far behind me, never to be seen more. And, besides all these good items in my favour, let me add, I had an unshaken trust in the goodness of Providence, which, according to my creed, never sent a being—brute or human—into this world, without sending food and clothing along with it: and tell me if I was not an independent man, though poor.

But poor and rich are subject to the laws of Nature; and my stomach, which happened to be tolerably fierce in the morning, when I started, by mid-day became quite outrageous, and I began seriously to think of a place wherein to spend my last elevenpenny bit. Nor had I long to think: a poor hut soon presented itself on the wayside. This will do, thought I; my small sum will be here welcome. I entered. An old woman was sitting alone by the fire. I bade her “good day,” and asked if she could give me anything to eat. I told her the sickly state of my purse, and that she must govern herself accordingly. She said nothing, but put down immediately some bread and a bowl of milk, upon which I made a hearty meal, took a smoke, and departed. In going along the road, I searched all my pockets, turning them inside out, in case any stray piece of money should have escaped observation: but, no; the total proceeds of my search, and, of course, the whole of my worldly stock, amounted exactly to one cent—a cent I was determined to part with on no consideration. I believe I have it yet.

Until near sun-down I travelled, never having seen but one house since I left the old woman's, where I got a most noble drink of cider. I at length came to a creek; and, on the opposite bank, a splendid brick mansion displayed itself—a welcome sight, as it gave me hopes of getting a warm bed for another night yet. I off with my shoes and stockings, waded through the creek, and approached the front door; but, from what I saw, the house appeared to be new and unfurnished; and there being no signs of inhabitants, I passed on. If I had but gone to the wing which extended back from the main building, I would have found everything I wanted, as the family was Scotch, and very hospitable. I afterwards got acquainted with them; but, when I first passed the house, besides the apparent want of inhabitants, it had too grand an appearance for a poor man to make familiar with; and, in fact, I was glad of an excuse to pass on, as the state of my pockets made me somewhat cowardly in asking for lodgings. Some hundred yards further brought me to a house of meaner appearance; but here also my heart gave way, and I went on. Another house of still meaner look came next; it was too poor, and I continued my journey. The sun was now set, and the shades of evening gradually succeeded. I had also got to the bottom of the hill, upon which, for the last mile, I had been travelling, and which was partly cleared; but my road now seemed to dip deep into the forest, which lay thick and dark before me. At a hundred yards on my left, the mountain, densely covered with the pitch pine, rose dreary and melancholy; while, on my right, its counterpart sprang steep and frowning in the evening air. I was evidently entering a defile, and where it was to end I knew not. I made a dead halt, looked back upon the hill I had just descended, and then forward into the gloom, as if uncertain whether to proceed or turn back. I determined upon the former; and if things did not turn out to my mind, I could retrace my steps to the houses I had already passed. I went on; and, contrary to expectation, twilight soon made its appearance again, through among the trees; and, by and by, a beautiful little valley lay before me, in the far corner of which stood a mill. My spirits began to cheer up, and my mind to be soothed; for the little valley was so beautiful, and everything was so still and quiet—not a sound was heard, not a movement, save the bat flitting hither and thither in his leathery flutterings. I stood for some minutes to view the quiet scene, and thought of Rasselas and Abyssinia. About a quarter of a mile before me was a high and steep ridge, thickly covered with trees, barring all egress in that direction, and making me doubt how my road was to get out of the valley; but, in proceeding forward, the road commenced winding round the hill on my right, which ended in an abrupt precipice crowned with pines. Immediately beneath the rock, and evidently built from its fallen fragments, stood a handsome, new, two-story house, with its front to the high ridge which bounded the farther side of the valley. It was a welcome sight to me, especially as a fire blazed cheerily from an open door in the back wing. I entered: there was nobody within but a boy, whom I asked if I might rest a little; and so sat down without further ceremony.

"To whom does this house belong?" I inquired; but the boy spoke so low I could not hear him, nor did it matter. I out with my pipe, and smoked away like desperation, as if it were to be my last. While enjoying myself to perfection, a tall, thin, swarthy man, looking exactly as if he had been brought up on spellings and red herrings, made his appearance at the door. He did not come in; but, leaning against the door-cheek, he seemed to scan me pretty closely. After a good look—

"May I ask," says he, "where you come from?"

"O yes," says I; "I come from Scotland."

"From Scotland!—and where are you going?"

"To Wheeling."

"To Wheeling!—Have you got your supper?"

"No!"

"Well, you better come this way and take some."

"I thank you, sir," says I; "I'll just take my smoke, and then I'll take the road again."

"I think," says he, "you'd better take some supper before you go to Wheeling: any how, at least, you'll be none the worse for it."

I did not like to stand out any longer, in case he might take me at my word—a thing the farthest from my mind and stomach possible; so followed him into another apartment, where was a well-spread table, at which I was kindly invited to take a place. While supper was discussing, arrangements were entered into between us that I should act schoolmaster during the winter; and, if I chose it, I could start for Wheeling in the spring. As the people appeared to be good, my pockets in bad condition, and good winter quarters not to be despised, I looked upon the bargain as a very providential one; and so, reader, having finished the labours of the day by a hearty supper, and the anticipation of a sound night's rest, we shall also put an end to this long chapter.

CHAPTER IX.

On the morning of the 12th of November, 1826, I rose from the bed of Zebulon Sheetz, gunsmith, Bethel Valley, Hampshire County, Virginia, and looked out of the window upon a beautiful little nook of terra firma, of the bulk of about twenty acres; terra firma beyond all dispute, not being able to slip away, on account of the steep ridges which bounded it on all sides—the only doors for bipeds and quadrupeds being at the three corners. The population of this little world, besides Zebulon, consisted of the miller and family, and a turner and his family; and, as a central position, for the convenience of the population of the neighbouring valleys, contained, in addition, an Episcopal chapel about size enough to hold an ordinary sized church organ.

Last night it had been determined upon to take a ride through among the hills, to see and collect subscribers for the Bethel Valley Academy. For my part, I could not see where the scholars were to come from, there were so many hills; but Mr S. not doubting the result, after a hearty breakfast we mounted our horses. My friend was mounted on a heavy gray animal, and I on a little black pony, brimful of laziness—so much so, that no kicking nor coaxing of mine could make it budge a bit faster than it chose. This was a praise-worthy qualification in my eyes; but not so in that of my Virginian friend, who, being a noble rider himself, as all the Virginians are, could not be bothered waiting for us. The result was, that I and the black pony had to march first; and whenever there was the least appearance of flagging, a smart application of a heavy whip on the rear made all things right again. I can give you little or no description of the day's ride, as we made as many windings and doublings as if we had been hunting hares instead of scholars; and even now, after knowing the country a great deal better than I did then, I could not, to save the life of me, tell what mountains we passed over, nor what valleys we descended into. Suffice it to say, it was a new kind of travelling to me; and I am now remarkably happy in being able to say I escaped without breaking my neck—a process I was more than once during the trip morally certain of undergoing. If I had been a hill-country Virginian—literally born and brought up upon horseback—or, if I had had any practice in fox-hunting—littered in a dog kennel—it is very probable I should have thought nothing of the matter; but as it was, the business was appalling. I had not yet got over the effects of my Newmarket gallop, and there was I again, with my head three or four feet higher than natural; and my whole body, for anything I knew, one thousand feet above salt-water level. But for the water level I cared not much, as there was little danger of my tumbling into the sea; it was the horrid land unlevel I dreaded: rock after rock met our way; and how to get down was beyond conjecture, except by tossing down soul, body, and pony, in the lump—three valuable articles—a thing not once to be thought of. The black pony and I might have been there to this day, reasoning upon the possibility or rather impossibility of descending at all, if (crack) the everlasting whip had not put an end to all reasoning upon the subject—an ad equitem kind of arguing, which brightened up the pony's intellect in a most admirable manner. To be sure, it was applied to the butt end; and some people may wonder at this; but although anatomists and physiologists had never spoken one word about the matter, as they have done, the old mode of making geniuses at our schools, by applying the argument to the breech instead of the head, would settle the point beyond dispute, that there is an intimate connexion between the two ends of an animal, and that the best method of teaching man and beast, is by the application of the lash. Solomon thought so, and my beast thought so too, for he no sooner felt the whip than he set to work in right-down earnest. As for myself, I had no other resource left, but to let go the bridle and lay myself down on my back with my head on the crupper, and my legs stretched out alongside the neck, and hold on to the saddle like grim death. By this method—meanwhile the horse was descending head foremost—I went down in the natural way, feet foremost, like a cat. How the animal achieved his part of the feat is more than I can tell, as I shut my eyes, expecting to open them again in some other world than Virginia; but achieve it he did, to the infinite merriment of my two companions.

I have said, that I recollect little of this day's ride; but as I wish to give my friends in Scotland as good an idea of this part of Virginia as I can, they will excuse me if I give them one or two more trifling incidents—which I happen to remember—connected with it. Indeed, the most of my observations thus far have been of a trifling character; and, in all probability, those that are yet to come will partake of the same frailty; but it must be remembered that “trifles make the sum of human things;” and the kind reader must also take good care to remember to forgive me, if I should sometimes, like the worthy mayor, begin my speech at the wrong end.

Bethel Valley, in shape bears a striking resemblance to the letter Y; so, after leaving Mr Sheetz's house, we travelled down the tail; and at the foot, crossed a small stream which runs down the middle of the valley. We then passed a tannery, and immediately afterwards a half-ruinous house, which they said was the abode of a hatter; and two or three hundred yards more brought us to rather a decent house, accompanied by a saw-mill, wool-carding machine, and cossinette factory, belonging to a Mr Edwards, about to be one of my patrons. As Mr Sheetz was a gunsmith, and his two neighbours, the one a miller, and the other a turner, it will be easy to see, without my telling, that this little remote valley had rather a manufacturing air about it. After leaving Mr Edwards', where we stayed a little, a few paces brought us to the big Capcaphon—the same creek I had waded yesterday—about a mile further up, and which I now crossed the second time. After passing through some fine woods, we struck upon the ridge or ridges, called Bear Garden; and here my memory fails me, as we made so many tacks and turnings, and all so much alike. But well I remember, on our homeward-bound voyage, we struck through a gully into a small deep valley, having some resemblance to a lime-kiln, or, to describe it more naturally, to the crater of an extinguished volcano. Its sides were not exactly perpendicular, but sufficiently so to allow you to roll rapidly down—wards for some hundreds of feet, if you and your horse were so inclined. Our road sloped downwards towards some outlet farther down, and was not much more than a foot broad, and worn by repeated use for a foot or more, leaving a kind of buttress on the tumbling side. We had to proceed rank and file, like a caravan of mules among the Andes; and I, of course, on the forlorn hope, with the tormenting whip immediately behind me. My head was nearly swimming; but, nevertheless, I got on pretty well till, all at once, I made a dead halt.

"Hillo! stop, gentlemen—the road's ended—don't whip."

"Why, what's the matter?"

"Why, here's a rock no mortal's fit to go down."

"Nonsense; get along."

"No, indeed; it may be nonsense; but down it on horseback I'll go for neither friend nor foe."

The obstruction consisted of a rock, which caused the road to take a new level five feet lower than that we were on. I was now on the brink of it, and, mounted on horseback as I was, the view to me was terrifying. To leap it was altogether out of the question; so I got off my pony the best way I could, and slipped down by myself, leaving the animal to get down the best way he could. On looking up to see how matters progressed with him, I saw him sitting on his haunches like a dog, with his head far above me in the air, and his fore-feet placed on the very edge, ready for some manœuvre or other. The sight was too much; and expecting, if he escaped breaking his neck, that he would come galloping along the narrow footpath, tumble me over the steep, and break mine, I took to my heels; nor did I stop until I had put a respectable distance between him and me. How he got down I know not; but, when I looked about, he was coming trotting along before the whip, as usual. We got home, at length, after, to me, a fatiguing but satisfactory day's work. In some future chapter I shall give a few more little adventures descriptive of this rugged country; and, in the meantime, put an end to this very short chapter and commence another.

CHAP. X.

On the 20th November I commenced my school, with a tolerably fair specimen of hill-country children, not by any means clownish, as might be expected from such an out-of-the-way part of the earth. Mischievous they certainly were; and of all the countries in the world, I believe the Virginian children, male and female, bear the palm for restlessness and mischief. They are lively and active; tongue, arms, and legs, always in motion; so much so indeed, that I heard of an Englishman who had to tie some of them on their seats to keep them in anything like a scholarly deportment. How it comes I know not, but they beat anything of the kind I ever saw. They are, however, full of ambition, and easily taught. Schools are numerous among the Alleghannies; but, on account of the nature of the country, not large; and a goodly proportion of the teachers are not much worth—a great many of them acting as farm-servants during the summer, and as pedagogues throughout the winter. The common wages are about two dollars per quarter; and for the poor children, the school fund allows, at a maximum, four cents a-day per pupil; which is obtained from the school commissioners, by presenting an account, attested on oath, before a magistrate. As keeping school is but a poor employment as regards money matters, as Wheeling was yet a great way off, and as I had again begun to taste the comforts of home, I was in no hurry leaving the Old Dominion, although Providence—poverty if you will—had cast my lot in a very wild portion of it. I don't complain of my lot; but Providence, if I may so speak, seems to me to have taken a pleasure in throwing me into the by-places of the earth, where the chief things to be got were plenty of blue devils and ennui. After leaving home, it cast me, like a piece of drift wood, on the shore of an isolated Canadian settlement; I was next buried for years among the Alleghanny Mountains; and now I write this upon what may be called a small island in the swamps of Louisiana. But I don't complain; and, as I was saying, was in no hurry to leave Virginia; and even if I had been in the greatest hurry possible, it was not possible to leave it for want of funds, the end of the year generally finding me as poor as the beginning. I, of course, made several little observations, the communication of which may perhaps afford some amusement to my friends in the Old Country. In making such communications, I shall observe nothing like system, but note down the several items as they stand in my journal, at the same time taking the liberty to group like observations together as far as my memory serves me. I will thus present my readers with a kind of olla podrida, pot pourri, or, in plain Scotch, a dish of hotch potch, which, in defiance of Dr Johnson and his hogs, is a very good dish after all. In connexion with the schools, we may then mention the church, the clergy, and the religion of the people of these glens. Before coming into Virginia, I had read in some geography or other, I think Morse's, that the Virginians were the greatest drunkards on the face of the earth, or at least an account which amounted to as much, and almost made me tremble to think of crossing the Potomac to mingle with such a generation of reckless dram-drinkers. But either Mr Morse must have been imposed upon, or the habits of the people must have undergone a great change since he wrote, or the description must belong to the Tuckahoes; for, as to the Virginians I lived among, I don't believe there is a soberer race of men anywhere to be found. No doubt there are but too many distilleries among these hills, and, of course, but too many drinkers, as in all other countries; but as to the respectable body of the community, independent of temperance societies and the teetotallers, you cannot find any more temperate than they are. I wish I could say as much for them as it regards tobacco. I have just read Madame Trollope, and however great a trollop she may be in other respects, she certainly does the Americans justice in the article of tobacco chewing. The Americans, according to their own account, beat all the world in a great many national accomplishments. However it be, it mattereth not, but in chewing tobacco they decidedly "beat all natur;" and Virginia is not a whit behind the sister States in this genteel accomplishment. The Reverend Mr F—— gave us a sermon about once a month. Upon one of these occasions I was much surprised at his asking for my tobacco.

"What! Mr F——, and so you have learned to smoke. Stop," says I, "till I get my pipe," quite overjoyed in having made a convert of the minister.

"Oh, no," says he, "I don't want your pipe; give me your tobacco."

"What do you want with my tobacco? you certainly don't chew?"

"No, but hand me out your tobacco."

I became stubborn, and refused to deliver up until he should tell me on what account. Mr F—— was a fine man, excellent preacher, and zealous in the temperance cause: he was temperate himself, and wished every body to be so too. In his journey to our place, he had persuaded all his chewing acquaintances to deliver up their idol, and give their promise to refrain from worshipping it for the future; and, in proof of what he said, he drew from his pocket a handful. I could not help bursting into a fit of laughter. Mr F—— was a pious man, knew his Bible well, but did not know human nature quite so well as Mr Slick. No, believe me, Mr F——, the very moment you are holding out that handful of tobacco, your new converts are chewing away as hard as they can. You may not see them doing so on your return; but when you come up next month, never mind, you'll be an eye-witness to what I'm saying. Fact: they gave up their tobacco when demanded, but continued chewing, the same as before. I was not quite so inconsistent. I told him plainly that, to save his feelings, he should never see me smoking, but that, upon no consideration, would I consent to give up one of the best friends I had upon earth, my comforter in affliction, my counsellor in doubts, my helper in straits, my companion in solitude, and, next to my Bible and my books, my principal delight.

These backwood Virginians, far from being a drunken, profligate, good-for-nothing sort of people, as I had half anticipated, are, on the contrary, sober and quiet; and may, with great propriety, be called a religious people. There are, no doubt, plenty of nothingarians among them; but I observed it was no way creditable to be of that persuasion. The principal denominations are the Presbyterian, Methodist, Baptist, Episcopalian, Quaker, and Dunker; the latter rather an eccentric body of believers. The most of these have got their pastors, who afford them their spiritual food as time and convenience suit; for, from the nature of the country, regular preaching, except in the villages, cannot be afforded to all. For their accommodation, many little chapels are scattered up and down; but the most common church is the school-house or private dwelling. The Presbyterian clergyman of Romney, Mr F——, visited us about once a month, and, in addition to his Bible class—of which he had many among the hills—gave us a sermon. Sometimes we had a young preacher in his stead. The Presbyterian clergy of America are a very respectable body of men, and by far the best preachers of any I have heard. What astonished me was, that none of them, so far as I knew, wrote out their sermons, or preached from notes. They took a text, turned it over and over in their minds, looked to it in all its bearings, and then trusted to memory and confidence to make a sermon of it. They did not make much attempt at oratory, but talked away quietly but impressively to the congregation, like one friend talking seriously to another. The first sermon I heard in the country was from a young man, and he certainly blundered away most wonderfully. Thinks I, young man, you ought to have had your lesson better; but I did not then know that he was speaking extempore. He blundered on to the end notwithstanding, and I trembled much; but un-Felix-like, more for his credit than my own sins.

Next to the Presbyterian clergy come the Methodist. Take them all in all, they cannot be compared to the former in education; but there is a pathos and earnestness in their discourses which amply make up for the deficiency—witness the strange effects produced at their camp-meetings. Their love feasts must be strange affairs certainly. They are a very zealous set of men, and wherever there is the least chance of making a convert, there you will find a Methodist minister. Of course there are plenty of them among the Alleghannies, in the shape of elders, circuit-riders, and preachers; the latter, so far as I observed, remarkably illiterate. I presume they know their Bible well, however; the best library, in fact, a minister of any persuasion can have recourse to.

I have never been at any of their camp meetings; they having always been held at too great a distance for me to attend; but I have talked with many who have attended them, and truly the accounts were appalling and wonderful, and the effects produced upon the human mind at these meetings altogether unaccountable by any hypothesis I can produce. I have some idea of them, however, from what I saw take place in a young man whom I knew well. He was quiet and pious, and was coming forward as a minister, although, with regard to education, a total bankrupt. This circumstance I did not know at the time, and, of course, was much surprised, one evening, to get an invitation to go over the creek and hear Tom preach. By-the-by, his name, if I recollect right, was O'Connell. Our church was a carpenter's shop, half-cleared out; a brother clergyman was there to support and encourage him, and the congregation was composed mostly of men. The services commenced with a hymn, sung in that beautiful style for which the Methodists are remarkable; then followed the prayer, sensible, pointed, and full of that unction and pathos for which the Methodists in their prayers are also remarkable. Next came the text; what it was I do not remember, nor doth it matter, as it might have been chosen by bibliomony for any relationship it and the sermon had with one another. The latter was one of the strangest pieces of composition ever held forth to an audience; being a medley of all the reasonings, prayers, entreaties, texts, ejaculations, interjections, sighs, and groans, he had ever heard, read, or enacted heretofore; and all huddled on the top of one another, and mixed heads and tails, like a large litter of pigs in stormy weather. As he proceeded he waxed warmer and warmer, his glaring eyeballs were kept steadily fixed ceiling-ward, and streams of foam gushed from each corner of his mouth, while his arms played round his head like desperation, as if he were fighting a swarm of hornets. I have seen many madmen, but I never saw one so mad as my friend Tom was upon the present occasion; he actually frightened me. . . .

I one day went to a small chapel, about two miles down Paterson's Creek, to hear a Methodist preach. The clergyman, in his route thither, had fallen in with Jesse Monroe, a Baptist preacher, one of the cleverest, and very shrewd withal; and, as a matter of course, he gave him an invitation to accompany him to the chapel. No doubt the congregation was a little startled on seeing the two lovingly seated in the same pulpit; I was, and still more so, when, in the course of the sermon, I heard the salvation of the brutes seriously proclaimed and maintained. Jesse was startled too, for the last words of the peroration had scarcely died on the preacher's lips, when he started to his feet.

"This is a strange doctrine," says he, "we have heard; the Methodists have a great many strange things about them, but this is the strangest of all. Brute beasts! Salvation of brute beasts! Whoever heard tell of the salvation of brute beasts! I have heard and read of the salvation of sinners, but never, no, never of the salvation of asses and horned cattle. The doctrine is abominable!"

Jesse sat down quite irritated; and Mr Smith rose up calmly and dignified, with a smile of self-complacency upon his countenance.

"I am very happy," says Mr Smith, "that Brother Monroe has given me an opportunity of farther explaining myself on this point, and supporting my views by Scripture."

So saying, he referred to the well-known eighth of the Romans, part of which he read as proof conclusive of what he had advanced; and after making a few remarks, which mended the matter but little, sat down, in all appearance quite satisfied. The whole affair was vastly amusing: it was the farce of "Raising the Wind," after the tragedy of "King Lear." If more such exhibitions were given to the public, I would warrant crowded churches. . . .

What I have been saying about clergymen, I would like to have understood as not meant to apply to the American clergy in general; than whom, I believe, there is not a more respectable body of men anywhere to be found, either as regards talents, education, or piety; but only as referring to the bulk of those I met with among the mountains. The remarks are, besides, given to shew that these Virginian mountaineers, far from being the graceless drunken set, represented by Dr Morse, are, on the contrary, a quiet, religious, church-going people. In further corroboration of this, I would add, that they have got numerous Sunday schools and Bible classes; that they are anxious to give their children education, especially a religious one; that the books principally read are of a religious nature; and that of the four families with whom I sojourned, three of them had family worship every night; and although in the fourth it was omitted, through diffidence I suppose, it was decidedly a religious family. One of my principal employments, in the winter evenings, consisted in reading a sermon or religious book aloud to the family; after which, not unfrequently, the old man would take his flute, and the younger members of the family would join him with their voices in some pieces of church music. In Scotland, a common amusement by the fireside is the singing of songs; in the part of Virginia in which I was located, hymns and church music are substituted. I was often amused to see our youngest boy, Sam, while lolling in the cradle, tossing up his heels in the air, and bawl, at the top of his voice, "Hallelujah, praise ye the Lord." In fact, the singing of hymns is so common, that the children learn to sing church music from their very infancy.

I was invited by a Captain C. to go and stay a night with him. The captain is a very wealthy, respectable man; remarkable for his humanity and kindness of heart. Wherever a sermon is to be preached, the captain is sure to make one of the congregation: wherever there is a sick person, there you will see him also without fail; and as he has not much to do, he generally rides about with a calomel bottle and a spring lancet in his pocket, ready to put them both in operation at a moment's warning. Well, I went down to see him, and after having chatted till near bedtime, I was somewhat surprised at hearing his stentorian voice breaking out into a hymn, right off-hand, without any intimation whatever. We sat very quiet until he had finished, when he asked me if I chose to go to bed. Now, the hymn, I am almost certain was intended as a substitute for, if not rather the evening prayer itself.

Mr Sheetz and I one Sunday took a ride four or five miles to see a friend, and pass the day with him. The family consisted of Mr H., his wife, and four fine daughters; and the way we spent the Sabbath was as follows. After a hymn and prayer, I read one of Saurin's sermons, when we had another hymn and prayer, and then concluded the service with an excellent dinner. In the afternoon Mr S. proceeded homewards, and left me to get better acquainted. The girls sang delightfully—the father was a good bass—so we spent the time very agreeably, until, by my untimely criticisms, I put a stop to the music altogether. Among other song tunes which they had adapted to their hymns, and sung as sacred music—and why not—I recollect “Rule Britannia,” and “Jockey to the Fair.” Upon my mentioning the latter as belonging of right to a fine old Scotch song, the whole choir came to a dead halt. I don’t believe they were angry at me for giving them some information they did not know before, but that they were afraid of transgressing upon the sanctity of the day and their own character, by singing tunes of an equivocal cast. It is somewhat remarkable, that, during four years I stayed in this part of Virginia, I never heard a song sung except when I myself was the musician; which generally took place in my solitary rambles along the banks of the creeks: It is considered as sinful. When I went first upon Peterson’s Creek, about forty miles further up the country, I stayed all night in the house of a widow lady, a Methodist, with whom, at the time, were staying two young ladies. As I am very fond of music, I asked them if they could sing, and whether they would favour me with a song.

“We don’t sing carol songs,” was the reply.

“Well, never mind,” quoth I, “give us an uncarnal one: ‘twill do just as well.”

Without minding my joke, if it be one, they complied with my wishes, and sung well too.

Before finishing my chapter I must give another instance in proof of the prevalence of religious feeling in this part of Virginia. I got acquainted with an Englishman, a Yorkshireman, who had been some time in the country. I met with him frequently, and he was always telling me to come over and see him.

“Where is your house?”

“Oh, just over the creek.”

Over the creek I went one fine Saturday, and walked through the woods for two miles without seeing anything like a house: thinking I had mistaken my way, I turned back; so did not see the Englishman that day. I met him again, and the old question came out,

“What’s the reason you don’t come to see me?”

I told him that I had tried to come and see him, but could not find the road.

“O man, you can’t go wrong; it’s just over the hill.”

I crossed the creek a second time, and walked down the bank for some hundred yards, to where the ridge, over which I supposed the object of my search lay, ended in a high pyramidal peak, encumbered, at the bottom, with the rubbish of centuries. For some time back I had had a great desire to visit the top of this peak, and I now thought that I could perform two tasks at once, by mounting the ridge at the end, and travel along till I came in sight of the Englishman’s house. I mounted, and, after having a fine view of the romantic country through which the Capecahon flowed, I took my course along the ridge. I walked for a mile or two, expecting every moment to come upon the road which led over the hill, but no; no roads were to be seen, but sheep trails, one of which I kept until I came upon a thicket, or hammock of briars, stunted locusts, and thorns, which I entered, supposing I would soon get through it. But the further I proceeded, the more entangled I got, until, from stooping, I had to take to my hands and knees, upon which I travelled till completely worn out. By good luck, I came to a chamber or den finely shaded from the mid-day sun by a thick roofing of these thorny shrubs, and out of which there appeared no egress in the direction of the Englishman. Here I had to stop: but before retracing my weary windings, I thought I would take a rest; did so, and fell fast asleep, and slept till sun-down. When I first opened my eyes, or rather half opened them, it required a considerable deal of rubbing and scratching to enable me to solve where in all the world I possibly could be. Having got to the end of my theorem, I went to my knee-work again, and reached home about supper time, with the determination to reach the Englishman’s house the first good Saturday, or perish in the attempt. I accordingly started the third time, took the road, and reached my destination after five miles of hard travel through a sandy-pine barren—these five miles being what they called “just over the creek, just over the hill.” The Yorkshireman, wife, and family, gave me a hearty welcome; but what I want to come to is, that a little while before bedtime, being tired talking, I took up an almanac, and, with one leg upon the mantel-piece, began to amuse myself by looking over the anecdotes, from time to time setting up a hearty laugh. At the end of one of my peals—and mine are generally real horse laughs—I thought I heard something like groans, mingled with deep sobs, fall upon my ear. I quickly turned my head round, thinking mine host had fallen into some fit or other; but beheld him on his knees deeply engaged in prayer. I was dismayed at my unintentional want of good-breeding and devotion; but the idea was so ludicrous of one man praying, and another laughing over the funny stories of an almanac, that, when I dropped upon my knees, which I did immediately, it was not in a very devotional spirit. A little while before the man went to his knees, I heard him muttering something about prayer and duty: but little did I think he was about to commence work so unceremoniously, with the doors open, and not a single member of the family present.

I must tell another story yet: The Rev. Dr M. was travelling through among the hills, and arrived about nightfall at the house of a farmer with whom he was a little acquainted, and with whom he intended to stay for the night. Family-worship time came round; the doctor excused himself from performing the duty, as being much tired, and wished the farmer to proceed as usual. He did so; and the doctor, overcome with fatigue, fell asleep. When he awakened, the good farmer was still praying. Alongside the doctor, lay an old negro, sending forth nasal sounds, melodious as from the drone of a bagpipe. The doctor tried to awaken the sleeper, by moving him gently; but as it requires little less than the shock of an earthquake to awaken an Æthiopian, he was, all other means failing, forced to give him a smart push in the ribs with his elbow, which cut short the drone pretty quick.

"What massa want?" whispered the half-awakened negro.

"I want to know," replied the minister, "when your master is going to stop praying."

"Whar 'bout is massa?"

"Can't tell that," said the minister; "I have been sleeping."

"Is massa come to the Jews yet?" whispered the black. "Whenever massa come to the Jews, massa soon done." So saying, the negro laid down his head, and commenced his old music, leaving the doctor to follow his example, and the farmer to come to the Jews as fast or as slow as he pleased.

I have not spoken of the black clergy, of whom there are a good many; and some of them preach pretty well too, considering. I believe it is contrary to law for them to preach, or for the blacks to collect together in conventicles of any sort; but, like a great many laws, the infringement is winked at; and you will see as many whites attending to the instructions delivered by a slave, as those delivered by the white preacher. It is also contrary to law to instruct the blacks in religion, or any other branch of education; but the infringement of this law is also connived at, and many masters teach their young slaves to read, and also teach them the catechism.

In Virginia, I have been in only one town church, and I do not recollect whether it was the case there or not, but in the country chapels and meetings, all the men sit on one side of the house, and the women on the other, while the blacks stand about the door.

O'DONNEL'S DAUGHTER; OR, OPPOSING DUTIES.

PART I.

AMONG the Irish gentlemen who joined the standard of William the Third, there was no one more distinguished for devotion to his cause, and personal bravery, than Colonel Eustace de Claremont—a gentleman of ancient family, who had, since the death of his father, abjured the Catholic religion. He was a second son; but as his elder brother, who was attached to the religion of his forefathers, and to the exiled monarch, had fled to Spain early in the conflict, De Claremont had become possessor of the family estate; since, according to the cruel laws of those days, any member of a Catholic family could, on becoming a Protestant, eject his father or brother from his estates and enjoy them himself.*

It will easily be believed that De Claremont's motives for this change of religion were misinterpreted; many of his friends, and even of his relations, jealous perhaps of his favour with the new Sovereign, allowed that his motives were liable to suspicion; but though aware that he was the object of this petty detraction, Colonel De Claremont kept on, unmoved, the tenor of his way, and only held his head, perhaps, more loftily than usual.

Of all those whom party feelings led to judge De Claremont with severity, there was no one more bitter against him than Mary O'Donnel, the only child of a gentleman of royal descent, but of small fortune, who was one of the warmest adherents to the cause of James the Second. O'Donnel had married a Scotch lady of noble birth, and, as is customary, had agreed that the daughters of that union should be educated in the Protestant faith; consequently, Mary O'Donnel was of the Reformed church, but still she was devoted to the Stuarts with all the ardour of youthful enthusiasm. Hence she hated, as much as she could hate, the Prince of Orange, as she persisted to call him, and those who had fought and conquered in his cause. Colonel De Claremont, therefore, who was personally unknown to her, was particularly the object of her dislike; and when she heard that he had changed his religion in order to gain his brother's fortune, she was afraid of visiting her friends, Sir Charles and Lady Osborne, who were intimate with this vile offender, lest she should be exposed to meet Colonel De Claremont. But when the aunt, with whom she resided, was obliged to leave London for a few weeks to nurse a sick friend, she ventured to accept Lady Osborne's invitation to pass the time of her aunt's absence at her house at Whitehall, because the papers had, the day before, announced the departure of De Claremont on an embassy to the Netherlands. When she entered Lady Osborne's drawingroom, soon after her arrival, her friend beckoned her in silence to join a group in the recess of a large window towards the street; and she found there two gentlemen in earnest dispute on the comparative merits of Spencer and Chaucer; the one preferring the allegorical, the other the story-telling bard. During this discussion, Mary O'Donnel saw that she was beheld with evident admiring observation by a gentleman who took no share in the argument; and he was formed to excite as much interest as he seemed to feel. In height, he towered considerably above those around him; and a look of great intelligence gave additional power to his fine and regular features, while an air of habitual command took from the youthfulness of his appearance, but added to its dignity.

"I wonder who he is," thought Mary O'Donnel; and she was still more eager to know when, on the conversation's changing to the comparative merits of Milton and Shakspeare, the unknown, in a voice of deep melody, gave the palm to Shakspeare, and defended even his faults. "He must be a Loyalist," thought Mary O'Donnel, "as all the Prince of Orange's men admire Milton most, from party spirit;" and when the speaking eyes of the stranger continually appealed to her as he proceeded, her look of assent to his remarks was accompanied with smiles of the softest complacency. While thus agreeably engaged, Mary O'Donnel unconsciously looked up, and as the fatal window through which the unfortunate Charles the First walked to the scaffold met her view, she turned away in evident emotion.

"I thought you would soon change your place, Miss O'Donnel," said Lady Osborne, in a low voice; "that window is, I know, a painful object to you."

"Indeed, it is," she replied; "and what I have heard to-day made it particularly appalling!"

"What have you heard?"

"I will tell you some other time." And the subject would have dropped, had not a gentleman exclaimed, in a hoarse voice—

"Well, young lady, how our tastes differ! I overheard what you said, and I assure you that I look at that window with pride and satisfaction, as it recalls the day when a tyrant's blood was shed by the just vengeance of those whom he had oppressed; and I wish I had been alive then, to vote for his execution!"

"Horrible!" said Mary, shuddering.

"Is it possible, sir," cried the unknown, "that any one can lament having been spared the misery of sitting on such a trial, and the guilt of giving such a vote?"

Mary's eyes now turned on him with greater pleasure than before, and she had drawn nearer to him, and farther from the hater of the unhappy Charles, when the latter observed with a sneer—

"Little did I expect to hear anything like a feeling of compassion for Charles Stuart from the active enemy of his son, and the stanch follower of William the Third; you have surprised me, Colonel De Claremont!"

At these words the sensitive girl started; and having, while indignant blushes covered her cheeks, surveyed the soldier of William with an expression of angry astonishment, she fixed her eyes on the ground, and stood evidently absorbed in painful thought; for she was displeased with her friends for having, as she believed, betrayed her into meeting Colonel De Claremont, and with herself for having so much admired him.

He, meanwhile, understood the cause of her change of manner, and was so affected by it, that he was unable to reply to his opponent, and glad when another subject was started. But it was an unfortunate one for him. A lady asked when he had heard from his elder brother. Then Mary's eyes were no longer averted from De Claremont, for she looked at him to mark on his cheek the blush of a reproving conscience; but his colour remained unchanged, and his eye retained its open expression, while he replied:—

"I am sorry to say that I have not heard from him for some days; and I am uneasy on his account, poor fellow! he has been ill lately," he added, with a deep sigh.

"Hypocrite," whispered the lady in the ear of Mary O'Donnel, who seemed by her countenance to echo the expression. "Mr de Claremont," continued the lady, "has great sensibility; and to have poverty added to exile, is enough to wear down a frame already feeble from many cares."

"Poverty! madam!" cried the Colonel, a deep blush overspreading his cheek.

"Yes, sir—that is, he has now only a younger brother's portion; nor even that, I fear, as he is circumstanced."

"Poor man! how I pity him!" said Mary, in a low tone, but one which had more meaning in it than she was conscious of.

"I understand Lady Catherine Graham now," replied De Claremont, with a cold proud look; then, with a deep sigh, he turned on Mary a glance of mild reproach, which seemed to say—"And do you too think so meanly of me?"

Lady Osborne now beckoned the ladies out of the room—

"Pray tell me, Miss O'Donnel, what you heard to-day, which made the sight of Whitehall to you more painful than ever?"

"I have had a letter from my father, telling me that a plot has been discovered to assassinate the King."

"Wicked wretches!" cried Lady Catherine. "I should not wonder if that was the business on which Colonel De Claremont was going abroad. He told us, you know, Lady Osborne, that he was countermanded; and, no doubt, it was because the plot was discovered."

"Allow me to tell you, Lady Catherine Graham," replied Lady Osborne, indignantly, "that if the King, William the Third I mean, had desired to have an assassination committed, he would not have let such a man as Eustace de Claremont into the secret."

"You are partial, Lady Osborne."

"And you are prejudiced—party spirit and other feelings blind you."

"How? Am I prejudiced in believing he changed his religion to gain his brother's estates?"

"Ay," cried Mary O'Donnel, "deny that charge if you can."

"I despise the charge too much to reply to it; but, my dear Mary, how can you allow party spirit to make you believe such charges against a man of whom you know nothing?"

"But appearances are against him."

"O yes," interrupted Lady Catherine; "and even his relations and friends accuse him; and how he is altered! he is really grown quite ugly!"

"Ugly!" exclaimed Mary O'Donnel; "you surprise me by such a remark! I think I never saw so handsome a man, nor so fine a countenance; and I assure you, Lady Catherine, I was quite vexed to find Colonel De Claremont so good-looking!"

They were now summoned to the supper-table; and it so happened that De Claremont had to lead Mary O'Donnel into the room; but they walked in silence, for De Claremont saw that Mary believed the accusation against him; and he who met danger undaunted in the field, now quailed before the repellent coldness of a timid girl.

The evening, as may be supposed, passed heavily away, and the company soon broke up; but Colonel De Claremont remained, and resealed himself next Sir Charles. Mary would have retired when she saw who the remaining guest was, but Lady Osborne peremptorily forbade it; and Mary instantly began to turn over a book of prints which lay near her. But no attempt was made to induce her to converse; and she overheard De Claremont say to his friend—"I want to talk with you on a subject that greatly distresses me—my poor brother was very unwell when he last wrote, and I fear he never received my last remittance; what can I do? Shall I send a confidential person over with money, lest he should be distressed?"

"Certainly."

"But whom can I send? Here is his last letter: he must be very ill, or he would not have delayed his marriage."

"What, Eustace! is your elder brother going to be married?"

"Yes; and to a noble girl, who loves him the better for having resigned his country and his fortune for conscience' sake."

"Not fortune, Eustace, for he knew your justice and generosity."

"Yes, fortune, Sir Charles; for though he will always have the income of his estates while I live, yet mine is a precarious life, as every soldier's must be, and the next heir does not like him."

Mary O'Donnel could now no longer turn over the prints, but she raised her eyes to look at him whom she had so misjudged, and those eyes were filled with tears; and Lady Osborne smiled while she saw what was passing in the mind of her young friend.

"I think," said Sir Charles, "I know a young surgeon who has a mother at Lisbon, whom he wants to visit, but can't afford to undertake the journey; he is of unimpeachable character, and if he went he could judge of the state of your brother's health."

"The very man for me! let me see him directly! Oh, you have taken such a weight off my mind!"

"Hypocrite!" cried Lady Osborne, laughing, "when you know you changed your religion to get the estate of this brother whom you pretend to love!"

"I know that many persons think so," he replied.

"Yes; and I wonder you do not let the truth be known."

"How can I, without exposing myself to the suspicion of furnishing the enemies of my King with money? I should find it almost impossible to make other people believe that my brother has solemnly pledged his word to me not to employ the money I send him against the King and Government; therefore I must remain contented with the consciousness of my own integrity. It is not safe to let my enemies or the King's know the true state of things."

"And yet you are disclosing it to a fair enemy now!"

"But a safe and honourable one, I trust; and, I own, I purposely spoke as I have done in her presence; for though I care not what the generality of the world may think of me, I could not see Miss O'Donnel without wishing not to be thought ill of by her. I was neither surprised nor hurt at seeing the daughter of Major O'Donnel start and frown when she heard my name, as I believed her indignant emotion proceeded from loyal aversion; but when I suspected that it arose from disgust at my supposed moral turpitude, I could not be easy without trying to remove that false impression. May I flatter myself that I have succeeded, Miss O'Donnel?" he added, drawing near to her, while, with blushing cheeks and downcast eyes, she listened to this avowal.

"I am so shocked! so ashamed of myself!" answered the agitated girl; "pray, pray, forgive me."

"Forgive you!" he replied; "allow me to thank you for condescending to ask my forgiveness."

"Nay, Mary," said Sir Charles, "you did not calumniate, you only listened to calumny against my friend."

"Indeed I did; I joined in censuring him," exclaimed the ingenuous offender.

"Yes, yes, she tells you the truth," said Lady Osborne; "but I hope it will put her on her guard against party spirit in herself and others. As the daughter of O'Donnel, she has my leave to hate, but not to misjudge Colonel De Claremont."

"Then, pray," cried the latter, "in pity, teach Colonel De Claremont to hate the daughter of O'Donnel."

"Surely," answered Mary, timidly, "I may be allowed to esteem Colonel De Claremont as my friend's friend."

"Thank you!" said he; "I shall sleep the better for those kind words; and I shall bid you good night, lest anything less kind should fall from those lips. Good night; and remember, Osborne, to send the young surgeon to me to-morrow."

"He has forgiven me," cried Mary, while Sir Charles went out with his friend; "but I know not when I shall forgive myself."

On his re-entering, Lady Osborne repeated Mary's words to him.

"He will appear a greater criminal than ever in your eyes, Mary, when I tell you what he is now going to do."

"Indeed! what new wickedness are they projecting against the injured James?"

"Not one that I know of; but Eustace declared, when I begged him to cease his visits here while you stayed, because I knew you disliked to be in his company, that"—

"What! you told him this!" cried Mary. "For shame! and what did he say?"

"That is the offence to which I alluded. He declared that he would come every day during your visit, and force you, by dint of humble adoration, to endure him as a companion, however you might dislike him as a politician. Are you not indignant at his presumption?"

"Not very; I owe him some amends for having done him such injustice."

It was long before Mary O'Donnel closed her eyes that night. She was not sure O'Donnel's daughter ought to feel so kindly towards a man whom, she believed, that he disliked on principle; or that the loyal subject of James should admire the soldier and favourite of William, and she could not but own that admire him she did. De Claremont kept his word—he did come every day to see his fair enemy, as he called her; and she became so much his friend, in order, as she said, to make him amends for past injustice, that she dreaded the return of her aunt, as it would force her to give up an intercourse so delightful to her; for the loyal and Catholic Mrs Celia O'Donnel would not, she knew, receive the rebel soldier. And when that lady was expected every day, De Claremont and Mary O'Donnel deplored, in secret, the separation which, probably, awaited them.

In the meanwhile, Sir Charles had his misgivings on the subject.

"Have you no self-upbraidings, Clara," he said to his wife, "for having encouraged an attachment between two persons who never can be united?"

"None whatever; for I believe they will be united."

"Not with O'Donnel's consent."

"O yes! and with his delighted approbation."

"Impossible!"

"Excuse me; but I know his sanguine temper—whatever he wishes should be, he believes will be—there are many such persons in the world; and I know that he will think that his daughter's charms will win her husband over to the cause of James, and therefore he will think an union between them the finest thing possible for the interests of the exiled King."

"I wish you may be right," replied Sir Charles; "and now I am no longer averse to indulge Eustace with the confidential conversation which he is, I see, desirous of having with me."

An opportunity soon occurred, and De Claremont expressed to his friend his wishes and his fears.

"Fears of what, Eustace? Not fears of Miss O'Donnel's not returning your love, as it is very evident that the attachment is mutual."

"Do you think so? Then I am the happiest of men, if her father does not forbid the union."

"But Lady Osborne is sure he will not."

"That is good news, indeed; but I have not yet obtained the daughter's consent."

"Then you have really made up your mind to marry O'Donnel's daughter?"

"What an odd phrase! I tell you my happiness depends on marrying her."

"What! at the risk of displeasing your royal master and mistress by such a marriage."

"At all risks—I despise such considerations."

"But is not the difference in your sentiments an objection?"

"No—we agree on the most important of all opinions—our religious sentiments are the same—we worship at the same altar."

"And you probably expect to convert her to your political opinions."

"Certainly not—I should be sorry to see her willing to resign the opinions which she has imbibed from her childhood, and which filial love and respect have made sacred in her eyes. I should think that she who could so lightly surrender her first impressions, might not be faithful to the obligations which she contracted with me."

"But would it not gall you to the quick, when civil war (as it probably will do) breaks out again, to know that you went to the field of battle unaccompanied by the prayers of your wife for your success?"

"She would pray for my safety, Osborne."

"But perhaps you mean to quit the army when you marry?"

"What! deprive my Sovereign of my services when he may most require them? Never; and were my success with Mary O'Donnel to depend on such a step, I would not see her again."

"But if you marry her, and find yourself opposed to her father in the field of battle?"

"Do not conjure up such painful possibilities, Osborne. The only fear I think reasonable, is her father's refusing his consent."

"But what do you require of me, Eustace?"

"That you should go and tell Miss O'Donnel the whole of this conversation."

"Gladly, most gladly—and I will go to her directly."

As gladly was it heard by Mary O'Donnel, whose young heart had felt all the anxieties and doubts incident to youthful affection. How she admired his fidelity to him whom he believed his lawful Sovereign! How she loved his generous liberality of sentiment towards herself! And if her father would approve the marriage, it would be happiness unspeakable to be united for life to such a man. Eagerly, therefore, she authorized De Claremont to write to her father at St Germain's.

Major O'Donnel instantly assured De Claremont of his warmest approbation of his suit ; and to Sir Charles, in a confidential letter, he expressed the hopes which Lady Osborne had anticipated. He also expressed his delight at knowing that his almost portionless child would be so well provided for—De Claremont's fortune, which he derived from a Protestant mother, being amply sufficient for the purposes of luxury as well as content. And though Mary's aunt, on her return, forbade her ever to see her lover—being quite sure that her brother would forbid the union—she bowed in such meek submission to the will of the head of the family, that the wedding breakfast was given at her house.

When Colonel De Claremont presented himself at Court after his marriage, he fancied that he was not so warmly received as formerly, and that there was something sarcastic in the manner in which the Queen inquired after the health of his bride. But he cared not for the frowns of royalty, while he knew that the woman of his heart would receive him at his return with smiles of delight ; and the first six months of their union more than fulfilled the fond visions which hope had portrayed. But as a renewal of the war in Ireland was talked of at the end of that time, a cloud was thrown over their enjoyments ; for they could not converse on topics which became every day more and more interesting ; and the state of politics was to Mary like the forbidden chamber to the wife of Bluebeard. De Claremont's manner, as well as her own feelings, forbade her all inquiry on the subject ; and it was only from others that she heard her father was a busy agent in the cause of James in Ireland, and that an army, under the command of General Ginckel, was about to sail for that country, to lay siege to Athlone. The close union and interchange of feelings were, therefore, now destroyed ; still they could not repent of their marriage—they could only pray that the dreadful sword of civil war—that most detestable of all wars—might soon be sheathed ! But a new trial awaited them : Colonel De Claremont was ordered to join his regiment and sail immediately for Ireland ; and perhaps O'Donnel and he might meet in mortal combat ; for the latter had joined James' army there, and was commanding a small but gallant band, consisting chiefly of his relations and followers.

It was with mute and tearless anguish that De Claremont's wife received this intelligence ; but this moment of trial was attended with some alleviation ; for the sight of her misery, and the consciousness of his own, burst down the barrier of restraint which had subsisted between the married lovers ; and while Mary wept unrestrained on the bosom of her husband, the chilling anguish of her soul diminished. But rarely could she find an opportunity of unburthening her mind to him. De Claremont was daily engaged in conferences with his officers, at which she could not be present ; for how could the followers of William talk of their plans before the daughter of O'Donnel ? At one of these conferences, however, before she was obliged to retire, she overheard, with inexpressible comfort, that the wife of one of the officers was to accompany her husband to Ireland, which she had, till then, believed an impossible favour ; and when she was alone with her husband, she earnestly entreated permission to go with him to the scene of warfare. It was sometime before De Claremont had resolution to own to her that he despaired of obtaining the leave she asked—

"Because," said he, "you are, dearest Mary, O'Donnel's daughter."

"True ; but I am Colonel De Claremont's wife, and to my new duty I wish wholly to devote myself."

"And I believe you would faithfully fulfil it ; but my commander and my comrades might be suspicious, and"—

"Suspicious of what ? Of my betraying my husband, and leaguings with the enemy ?"

"But one of the enemy's commanders is your father ; and you are known to be a very loyal subject to the deposed King."

These words, though kindly spoken, gave such a pang to the heart of Mary, and brought with them such a consciousness of the wretchedness and helplessness of her position, that she fell into the arms of De Claremont, incapable of motion and utterance ; and it was some minutes before her terrified husband could obtain from her one word or one look indicative of perfect consciousness and sane recollection. At length a burst of tears relieved her ; and she desired to be allowed an interview with the commanding officer. De Claremont hesitated to reply ; but—

"Seek not to prevent me," she cried, with a decision of manner unusual to her ; "it is my only resource against misery, and perhaps distraction. Let him behold the agony which you have witnessed, and I am sure he will believe, in the terrible conflict which may be approaching, that I can remember nothing but that I am the wife of De Claremont."

She did see the General, and her request was granted.

On the morning of the first battle, when De Claremont, accoutred for the field, entered her apartment, the words of Sir Charles Osborne most painfully recurred to him.

"But I believe now, as I did then," said he to himself, "that she will pray for my safety. Alas ! to think that she cannot pray for my success !"

Mary turned pale when she saw him ; but her tears and caresses banished, for a while, the painful feelings with which he entered the room ; and in the agonising moment of parting, he forgot every consciousness but that of her devoted love. He would have been comforted, indeed, had he known that anxiety for his safety was the feeling uppermost in her mind during the whole of that eventful day, and that she felt no disquiet at the probable discomfiture of James' army, nor satisfaction at learning that the victory of William's troops had not been decisive.

All she wished to know was that her husband was safe. Her father, she knew, had not been in the battle, but had contrived to throw himself, with his little band of followers, into Athlone, to the siege of which they were to march the next day.

De Claremont was able to return to her that night; and she flew into his arms with a heart overflowing with gratitude to heaven; but as if willing to make his own misery, he said—

"You rejoice in my safety, Mary, but ask me nothing concerning my success."

"I know you have beaten the King's troops," she replied, changing colour.

"The King's troops!"

"My King's troops, I should have said," she replied, trying to smile.

"And for that you cannot rejoice?"

"Could you expect me to do so, De Claremont?"

"No, indeed, I could not," was his answer.

And, folding his arms, he stood absorbed in painful meditation; but the sight of her evident though suppressed grief aroused him into better feelings, and, suddenly snatching her to his heart, he tried to banish from her mind and his own every consciousness likely to cloud over the few short hours they had to pass together.

The next morning the forces under General Ginckel sat down, as the phrase is, before Athlone. Mary followed them, and took up her abode at the house of a relation of her's, within a few miles of the besieged town.

"You are sure," said Mary to her husband, "that you know my father?"

"Quite sure; and, as far as depends on me, his life shall be safe."

"Enough," she replied; "and I know he loves me too well not to respect your's."

Happily for Mary, she did not know the nature of the service to which he was hastening; for the honourable but fearful distinction was awaiting him of heading a detachment ordered on a forlorn hope; and never was there a more desperate service, nor one performed with greater intrepidity. In consequence of this gallant and unexpected attack, the Irish, amazed and confounded, abandoned the town in the utmost consternation; so that, in half an hour, it was in possession of the English. But Colonel De Claremont was so severely, though not dangerously wounded, that he was allowed to quit the town, and return to the residence of his wife. Accordingly, supported on his horse by a servant who was warmly attached to him, he, slowly and with considerable pain, reached the house of his wife's relation. As he approached, eager for the fond though tearful welcome which he knew awaited him, and for the quietness which his state required, he heard the sound of mirth and dancing in the house, and saw every window lighted up.

"What is going forward here?" he asked of a little boy at the door; and heard that a report had reached the family—loyal adherents of James—that the siege of Athlone had been raised, and the English repulsed with great slaughter. "And my wife is amongst those who rejoice!" thought De Claremont, with bitterness of soul, as Collins, with great difficulty, lifted him off his horse. When he entered the apartment, leaning on his servant, he cast a stern glance around in search of Mary. His appearance put an effectual stop to the mirth of every one; for Collins told the tale which his master was unable to utter, and their merriment was instantly converted into lamentations.

"But where is my wife?" cried he, impatiently, comforted to see she was not present.

"In her chamber, to be sure," was the pettish reply. "Mary O'Donnel would have rejoiced with us; but Mrs De Claremont is a different person; and she was so unhappy because she could not hear of her husband, and so fatigued with walking up and down the road in hopes of hearing some account of the battle, that she was forced to go to bed at last."

"Dear, dear creature!" cried De Claremont, almost choked with emotion, which had a mixture of self-blame in it, for having so hastily judged her. "Shew me to her room instantly! But no, pray let some one prepare her for seeing me thus."

The kind precaution was vain; the ear of anxious affection is so acute, that Mary, whom every sound alarmed, had not only heard the horse stop, but the sound of the military accoutrements; and while she redressed, she heard the voice of her husband inquiring for her. With eager joy she ran down stairs to welcome him. But, alas! she beheld him pale and bleeding.

"Remember that I am not dangerously wounded," he cried, unable to bear the sight of her speechless alarm; "and I am here, my love! Dearest Mary, compose yourself, or you will do harm to us both."

This hint was enough; and she was able to assist in helping De Claremont to his apartment.

He had told her the truth; his wounds were not dangerous, and it was so soothing to Mary to be allowed to attend on him day and night, that she was not glad when he was declared well enough to return into the scene of danger. The pain of this, their second parting, was increased by Mary's having learned that a general engagement was about to take place, as General Ginckel was resolved to hazard battle with the forces of St Ruth, though his army was inferior in numbers. But part they must; and though De Claremont knew that he left the person of his wife protected, he also knew that her heart was exposed to aggravated trial; for she had felt that her husband's recovery was not a joyful event to her hostess and her family, and that they could have no sympathy with the feelings of the affectionate wife. But her sufferings were not of long duration: after a very decisive victory, General Ginckel, who had orders to put a stop to the war at any rate, consented to a most advantageous capitulation, and the war in Ireland was ended by the famous treaty of Limerick.

PART II.

Sir Charles Osborne's prognostication that Colonel De Claremont's marriage would injure his interests at court, were, in some measure, realized. His wife did not accompany him to Whitehall, and he thought that the Queen resented her continued absence from the royal circle. He would not have been surprised at this had he known that his enemies had magnified a visit which he had made to the Princess Anne, who had sent for him on business, into a secret intimacy with her and her ambitious favourite; and the manner of the King himself became evidently colder; but, conscious of former services, he felt sure that they would employ him again when they wanted him. His expectations were too soon realized.

Rebellion had again broken out in Ireland, in different places; and though it had been quelled immediately, it was judged advisable to send over some English troops, commanded by experienced officers; and as De Claremont had particularly distinguished himself in the late Irish war, he was immediately named to undertake the duty.

"So I am selected for this service," said De Claremont, with exultation, "though I married O'Donnell's daughter! A proof of my Sovereign's unshaken confidence in my fidelity." But his poor wife felt that her domestic happiness was again endangered, as all her fears were renewed that her husband and father might meet in the field. De Claremont also had his secret fears. O'Donnell was known to have been frequently both in England and Ireland in disguise, and was supposed to be the agent by whose means the Princess Anne had private communication with her unhappy father. Therefore De Claremont felt the danger and difficulty of his situation; for, should he fail of subduing the Irish rebels, he might be suspected of not having exerted himself sufficiently, owing to his connection with O'Donnell: and both the husband and wife had cares and sorrows which they could not have the relief of owning to each other.

"Mary," said De Claremont to her, one day after his return from Whitehall, "you are, I trust, prepared to hear that my regiment is ordered to Ireland. I immediately received the order just now?"

"So soon!" she replied, turning very pale; "but, no doubt, I am to accompany you!"

"Yes! for we are ordered to Kinsale; and, as Rock Fortress is so nigh, we can live together there."

De Claremont inherited Rock Fortress in right of his mother; but his father had let it for a long term of years to Major O'Donnell, when he was a boy; and there Mary was born and educated. But, when it became his property, De Claremont refused to renew the lease, because he did not choose that his tenantry should be exposed to the political influence of O'Donnell. Therefore Mary O'Donnell saw herself about to retake possession of that house, as the wife of a Whig husband, in which she had been educated by a Tory father. Soon after this conversation, they embarked for Ireland, and Mary had the pleasure of welcoming her beloved husband to the place of her birth, and the abode of his maternal ancestors. De Claremont was struck with the singularity and wildness of the appearance of Rock Fortress and its gardens; but he did not see it with the admiration that Mary did; nor, in spite of his loyalty, could he admire a summer-house, nearly concealed by trees and shrubs, in the centre of the garden, which looked exactly like a place built to smoke in; and he expressed his intention of pulling it down.

"Of pulling it down!" cried Mary.

"Yes; it has such a vulgar Dutch appearance!"

"Therefore," she replied, with a sarcastic smile, "it ought to be sacred in the eyes of the loyal subjects of a Dutch King. It was my father's favourite retreat, and he used to shut himself up there for hours!"

"Meditating, no doubt," said De Claremont, laughing, "how he could dethrone my Dutch King—therefore I am the more bound to destroy it; but I have no time now to spend in embellishing my grounds. But what does this mean?" cried De Claremont, stopping before a tree: "here are, on this bark, the names of 'Mary O'Donnell and Edward Porter!'"

"It means," said Mary, blushing, "that, that"——

"What?" said her husband, grasping her arm.

"That Edward Porter and I were once on the point of marriage!"

"How!—the gallant Sir Edward Porter who so nobly defended the bridge before Athlone, when I led the forlorn hope?"

"Yes!"

"Yet you said I was your first love, Mary!"

"And so you were, my only love. I was persuaded, when I was only sixteen, to accept Sir Edward, because my father said his happiness depended on the marriage; but my rightly feeling lover seeing what I did not wish to conceal that I had no love for him, suddenly left us, leaving a letter to say, that he would not accept my hand without my heart—and I was so glad!"

"Well, then, I think I can bear to let this tree remain standing. But why did you not tell me of this love affair?"

"Because I think it odious and dishonourable for a woman to boast of her lovers."

"So it is, and I excuse you!"

And, for some time after this conversation, De Claremont's and Mary's domestic happiness remained unclouded, and was increased by the birth of a little girl. But, scarcely had Mary left her chamber, when the intelligence that the rebels had been seen in the neighbourhood of Kinsale, summoned Colonel De Claremont to the post of duty.

"And must you leave me again, De Claremont?" said Mary, tenderly watching the thoughtful brow of her husband.

"Yes, again and again, if your madbrained countrymen will force me to do so. It is said that the small but valiant band commanded by Sir Edward Porter, which performed such daring deeds before Athlone, and which was not found in the town when we took it, though it retreated in perfect order, has been seen between Kinsale and Dungarvon; and, it is probable, is concealed somewhere. It is supposed that it is here to cover the debarkation of James, who, with the aid of the Grand Monarque, is to favour us with another invasion, and is expected to land at Kinsale!"

"At Kinsale!" cried Mary, clasping her hands in agony. "And is my father with him?"

"It is said that your father, now General O'Donnel, is coming with the King. But some say he is still in France—and I wish it may be so!"

"Amen!" said, Mary; "and, at present, I will not, by my fears, cloud over the comfort of having you here, and safe, dearest Eustace!"

Those fears were removed by a painful reality: undoubted intelligence reached De Claremont, that as General O'Donnel was getting from a boat into the ship which was to convey him to Ireland, his foot slipped, he fell overboard, and, being carried by the waves under the vessel, he sunk to rise no more; and that, after several days, his body had been thrown ashore, and buried with military honours. The affectionate heart of Mary bled over this trial, till, ever ready to see the hand of mercy in all the dispensations of Providence, she owned that she ought to be thankful that she was now freed from the fear of having her husband and father opposed to each other in the hateful strife of arms. Besides, had not her father died when about to risk his life gloriously in the cause of his Sovereign? Nor was it long before she felt still more strongly the mercy vouchsafed to her in the removal even of a father so tenderly beloved; for an order was received by her husband to keep a strict watch for the rebels, who were said to be landed near Kinsale, and who, but for his death, would have been headed by O'Donnel; but were now commanded, it was suspected, by Sir Edward Porter. The order further commanded Colonel De Claremont to send the leader to London in irons, if he succeeded in securing him, that he might there undergo the death of a rebel.

Not long after, De Claremont departed with his regiment to scour the country near the house. In two days he returned; but he did not stay long before he again set off on his vexatious duty. The day that he left home, the second time, Mary observed an unusual restlessness about her own maid, Norah—a woman who had lived with her from her childhood, and who had a lover in the rebel army. As soon as De Claremont was gone, Norah entered the room where her mistress was sitting; and, looking the door, she advanced towards her on tiptoe, and, whispering in her ear, said, in a voice between a sob and a laugh—

"O my darling! I have such a joy for thee! The dead is alive and merry!"

And, unlocking a closet in the adjoining chamber, General O'Donnel appeared before his astonished child, who, rushing to his extended arms, fell nearly lifeless on his bosom. At first, all Mary's feelings were those of affectionate joy, and she listened with eager delight to O'Donnel's tale. He told her that, before he reached the port, an officer, second to him in command, who resembled him wonderfully in person, had been drowned, and thence the report of his death—a report he accredited by every possible means, when he heard it, by embarking privately, in disguise, at another port; hoping thereby to be of more service to the cause by introducing himself secretly, when landed at Kinsale, among those cottagers who loved him, and would follow wherever he led. "And I well knew," said he, "that my dear daughter and loyal child would enable her father to secrete himself in the well-known cavern." When he said this, all Mary's joy at her father's being alive was lost in the agonizing consciousness of the opposing duties which were entailed upon her; and, starting from her father's supporting arms, she clasped her hands wildly, exclaiming—

"Oh, what have you done? You should not have come hither! I dare not let you stay! Go, while your life is safe!"

"It must be safe, unless my child turn traitor to me," replied O'Donnel. "I conclude that you never betrayed the secret of the cavern to your husband, because, as it might one day be wanted as a retreat for our King, I made you promise, at the foot of the altar, to conceal the secret. Little did I ever think that I should find you and De Claremont residing here; but, when I saw Norah alone on the shore, I confided myself to her well-tryed fidelity, and she assured me that I should be as safe with you as with her. Tell me, wife of De Claremont," he added, in a stern voice, "am I safe, or will you betray me to your husband?"

"Oh, no! but what can I do?" said Mary. Then, rushing into the next room, she prostrated herself before Him who could alone direct her; and she returned to her father, anxious, but determined. "I will conceal you, my dearest father," said she, "in the place you mention; but I conjure you never to quit it, except when all our house is still, as, if De Claremont sees you, he has orders to send you in irons to England, to perish as a rebel."

"Indeed! and where is he now?"

"Trying to find your band, and its present leader; but he may return to-morrow."

"Then we have time," said O'Donnel, "to re-open the communication from the vault to the best chamber, which I stopped up."

"No; it might lead to a discovery. You must submit to be locked in my chamber till night; and, when all is still, Norah and I will go with you to the summer-house."

At night, or rather at one in the morning, the trembling Mary, with Norah, bearing a dark lantern, let their prisoner free, and led him to the queer-looking summer-house before named; the floor of which entirely drew up on one side by means of springs, and disclosed steps leading into a subterraneous passage, ending in a cavern, accessible from the shore only at low water, and made habitable, in secret, by O'Donnel himself, at the latter end of the reign of Charles II. In this cavern Norah now accompanied him, bearing what was necessary for his comfort and accommodation, while her alarmed mistress kept watch at the door.

No sleep had Mary that night; and, for the first time in her life, she dreaded her husband's return. The illness of her child afforded a sufficient excuse for her ill looks and mournful countenance—but, then, the concealment! the odious but necessary concealment!

"What is the matter, my beloved?" cried De Claremont, when he beheld her. But the child, at this moment, had a return of alarming convulsions; and De Claremont, while torn by all a parent's anxiety himself, could easily attribute the change in his wife's appearance to similar feelings. For two days and nights, De Claremont and Mary watched by the bedside of their darling girl; and Mary even forgot her father's dangerous vicinity, and all that it exposed her to, in maternal anxiety. On the third night, the child was thought out of danger; but Mary still chose to sleep beside her; and De Claremont, though alarmed for her health, was obliged to permit her to do so.

But Mary was that night painfully reminded of the rash, inconsiderate, and impracticable nature of her father. Indeed, had he considered the risk to which, as a wife, he exposed his daughter, he would never have asked an asylum in her house. Certainly, all he could do, after having thus, by means of the enthusiastic Norah, forced himself on her protection, it was a duty which he owed Mary to keep quiet in his hiding-place; but, instead of that, when Mary, feverish and restless, opened the window of her child's apartment to get the refreshment of air, the first object she saw was her father's tall figure reflected on the grass by the beams of the moon. This was not to be suffered; and, throwing a shawl over her, she hastened to conjure him to retire directly to his retreat; and, when she reached the house again, she saw De Claremont at his window.

"Surely, Mary," said he, joining her on the stairs, "it was imprudent for you to walk in the night air; but I conclude that you were feverish."

"I was indeed," she replied, shuddering with terror as she spoke.

"And now you are chilly?" said De Claremont. "Have you been alarmed, Mary? There is no rebel lurking, I trust. Could I have fancied it possible, I should have thought I saw a tall shadow disappear in the moonlight; but, then, moonlight is so deceitful to the vision."

"Yes, moonlight is," faltered out Mary; and, in another moment, she was insensible.

Till she recovered, every other feeling in De Claremont was lost in tender solicitude; but, when he had laid her by the side of her child, and seen her sink into a quiet slumber, he returned to his own bed—but not to sleep. Yet, was it possible that his wife should be in league with any of the rebels? No; honour and openness had hitherto marked every action of her life. Yet, had she not been exposing herself to the night air, in a manner for which there was not sufficient motive? and had he not seen the shadow of a man? At last, he came to this conclusion, that one of the rebels, lurking in the neighbourhood, might have entered the garden unknown to Mary, and presumed to accost her—trusting that, being O'Donnel's daughter, she would not betray him; or, perhaps, it was Sir Edward Porter! Under these circumstances, should he have a right to be angry if Mary, the next day, still concealed the fact from him? He hoped not. But the little girl was again so ill, that, during the whole of that next day, parental anxiety engrossed them both; and, at a late hour, De Claremont left the child's room, and retired alone to his own. But his sleep was short and disturbed; and again he rose and went to the window. Mary, meanwhile, having dismissed the nurse to bed, finding her child increasingly feverish, had raised it in her arms, and was carrying it about, in order to lull it to sleep by motion, when, as she passed the window, she again saw her imprudent father walking in the garden. As soon, therefore, as she could leave her charge, she stole down to tell him that De Claremont's suspicions were awakened, and to conjure him to retire; but he declared that he was ill, and should die if he had not air; and all he would promise was not to come in sight of the house; but, as Mary returned, she met De Claremont before, as she believed, that her father could be quite out of sight!

"Again this imprudence, Mary?" cried he, taking her cold trembling hand.

"I was going in, you see," she faintly replied.

"There is a man yonder! I am sure there is!" cried De Claremont.

"A man!" echoed Mary, with a piercing scream, following him as fast as her trembling limbs would suffer her; but, unable to go farther, she awaited De Claremont's return in fearful expectation. She was, however, relieved by finding that, as De Claremont did not go in the direction of the summer-house, her father must have got to his place of concealment before her husband could overtake him. De Claremont, who had sought the whole garden over, returned to her at length, slowly and gloomily.

"Mrs De Claremont," said he, "why are you lingering here?"

"You said there was a man in the garden, and I feared!"

"Oh! for my life, I suppose?" and he regarded her, as he spoke, with a look of sarcastic inquiry. "But I begin to believe that it was a spirit, not a man; for he vanished strangely. What do you think, Mary? But all conjectures are at present vain. However, I will cause every building in the garden to be razed to the earth to-morrow; for I, you know, must not expose myself to the suspicion of harbouring traitors; and it is said Sir Edward Porter is near Kinsale."

By this time they had reached their apartments; and De Claremont, coldly kissing her cheek, bade Mary good night. To her, rest was impossible. She felt how selfishly her father had acted in forcing her to expose her husband to suspicion by granting him a mysterious asylum; and she was also agonized with terror lest De Claremont should discover O'Donnel, and her husband be the means of bringing her father to the scaffold: but, in the night of her despair, she lifted up her soul in prayer; and, when she met De Claremont the next morning, her air was calm, her eye no longer avoided his. It was, however, a relief to her mind when, after breakfast, De Claremont was summoned away to Kinsale on business. The order, therefore, to raze the buildings was as yet delayed; but she sent Norah to tell her father that he must instantly depart. Norah, however, saw herself so constantly watched by Collins, that she dared not attempt to go to the summer-house.

When De Claremont returned, painful information awaited him, for his own old and confidential English servant, Collins, desired to speak with him. Collins was as much devoted to his king and his master as Norah was to her king and mistress; and each regarded the other with a jealous and distrustful eye. Collins had never quite forgiven De Claremont for marrying the daughter of an Irish rebel. It was now, therefore, with alarm, mixed, no doubt with a little spiteful triumph, that he told De Claremont that the gardener, was sure that on one particular walk, which was smooth and untracked when he went to bed, he had, for two successive mornings, found a man's footsteps, and beside them those of a woman; which proved, beyond a doubt, that a man and woman had been walking there together.

"And you know, sir," said Collins, "it could not be you and my lady."

"I was walking with her in the garden last night, Collins," replied De Claremont—a blush overspreading his cheek for the evasive reply.

"Indeed, sir," replied Collins, with a look of mortification; "but were you walking in the walk I mean?"

"No, not in that walk."

"Well then, sir, who could these people be?"

"Whom do you think they were?"

"I think, sir, they were Norah, and one of the rebels landed here; and yet the footprint is smaller than Norah's."

"But if not Norah's foot," said De Claremont, turning suddenly round, and sternly regarding him, "whose could it be?"

"Whose, indeed, sir," said Collins, sighing; "but, sir, shall I watch to-night?"

"No; I will watch myself; and hark ye, Collins! be sure that you name this business to no one. To-morrow I hope to be able to throw light on this mysterious affair, and to prevent any recurrence of such things in future."

"Now, then," said De Claremont, "there is no doubt but that my wife has midnight walks with some one; and though I question not her purity, I have only too much reason to know her loyalty to her own king; and as I see that Collins suspects her also, if I take no steps to investigate the business, I shall become an object of distrust to this faithful adherent of William; and, what I value more than my life, my honour may be irreparably injured."

De Claremont watched that night in the garden, and Mary watched at her window; but no O'Donnel appeared; and even for two nights he never came; and some degree of peace was restored to the minds of Mary and De Claremont. The third night, De Claremont, weary and exhausted, went to bed, and did not awake till morning; but O'Donnel had walked again, and the terrified Mary had walked with him. When De Claremont rose, he found Mary as anxious about her child as ever; and it was with pain that he went to Kinsale, with the prospect of not returning home for two or three days.

"Must you indeed stay away so long?" said Mary.

"Shall you be very sorry if I do?" replied De Claremont, in a cold, sarcastic tone, which Mary did not like.

"Yes, certainly," she replied, deeply blushing.

De Claremont said no more, but, shaking her carelessly by the hand, bade her farewell.

"Before you go, sir," said Collins, "I wish to say—it is my duty to say"—

"Well, sir, say on," cried De Claremont.

"Why, sir, I watched last night, and I saw—I saw"—

"What?"

"A tall gentleman walking in the garden."

"And why did you not seize him?"

"Because, sir, my mistress, your wife, was walking with him!"

"You would swear this, fellow, would you?" cried De Claremont, seizing him by the arm.

"I would, sir; and to the King in council. O sir, should such things be on the premises of Colonel De Claremont? for, doubtless, the man is one of the rebel chiefs, whom you were to deliver up to justice."

"Yes, yes," cried De Claremont; "it is not a lover of my wife's, but it may be a kinsman."

"No matter who it is, sir; he ought to be"—

"And shall be, Collins. The fond husband will only remember that he is a faithful subject; but it is better, for my sake, that you should ascertain the fact in my absence—watch, therefore, yourself, with proper witnesses; but watch in silence and from the house, and do nothing till I return."

Collins saw his master depart, much relieved in his own mind, but having embittered his master's almost beyond endurance; for, as De Claremont slowly journeyed to Kinsale, he was at length compelled to own to himself, that, after such dereliction of a wife's duty, as exposed him to disgrace, he must separate from Mary, and send her back, in a measure, dishonoured, to her aunt.

"And, oh! if the man in question should turn out to be Sir Edward Porter!"

The known absence of De Claremont, which O'Donnel heard of from Norah, who was on the watch for him, emboldened that rash man to walk even longer than usual; therefore Collins and his witnesses saw his person perfectly, though not his face, and also saw Mary walk with him, in great agitation; for she was persuading him to leave Ireland. But when they watched the second night, no O'Donnel appeared, for he was ill; but they saw Norah run across the garden, and, after a short time, return to the house, whence, soon after, Mary issued, carrying a basket in her hand. But she went they knew not whither, and it was near daybreak before she returned. This information, also, Collins sent to his almost broken-hearted master, who now returned home, resolved to impart to Mary what he had discovered, and convince her that she must, for his sake, consent to leave Rock Fortress, and be separated from him.

Mary, meanwhile, having, as she hoped, prevailed on her father to quit Rock Fortress, if not Ireland, and seeing her little girl recovering, was awaiting De Claremont's return with affectionate pleasure. But, when she saw him, all her pleasure vanished, and in its stead, came anguish and alarm! for his cheek was pale as death, and his air repellent.

"Poor innocent!" cried he, as he kissed the child reclining in its mother's arms. "As yet, I trust, I shall not be thought too forgiving a husband, if I permit thy misguided mother to carry thee away with her."

"Away! why, whither am I going, De Claremont, and wherefore?"

"Ask your own heart, Mrs De Claremont, if you have deserved to remain here; ask your own heart if the midnight companion of an ambushed rebel be a fit wife for Colonel De Claremont. I myself, and my servants also, are witnesses of my disgrace and your perfidy. Can you deny the charge? Can you justify yourself? If you can, I conjure you, by our past loves, Mary; and by these bitter tears, which manhood blushes for, I conjure you, again and again, to say you are innocent, and that I may still keep you here."

"I am innocent!" replied Mary; "but I cannot deny the charge."

"What do I hear," cried De Claremont, striking his hands on his forehead in frantic agony; "even in the midst of despair, I find what I had hoped. I hope you would yet contrive to make me distrust the evidence of my own eyes; but to hear you avow your guilt!

Oh, it is too much, Mary; how have I deserved this from you, and by what fallacy have you been led to believe that your duty to your King, or to some old friend of your own, can weigh for one moment against the duty which you owe your husband? I did not expect this even from O'Donnel's daughter!"

"If I were not O'Donnel's daughter," replied Mary, mournfully, "this misery could not have come upon me; but I am resigned to the will of Heaven; and bitter as my trials are, I humbly trust that I shall be carried through them all. When is it your pleasure that I should leave you?" said Mary.

"Not till the day after to-morrow," said De Claremont; "for then my sister has written me word that I may expect her; and I shall want the support of her company when you are gone."

"Oh! let me go before she comes. You know she never saw me in my good days—do not let her see me in my state of degradation. But, no, she will see me a humble, submissive sufferer; and that, I trust, is not a state of degradation. But you said I should take my child with me?"

"Yes."

"Thank you; that is kind," cried Mary, seizing his hand forcibly, and kissing it.

Mary had one hope: if her father would quit his retreat and escape, she might then tell De Claremont the truth, when she thought he was safe from pursuit; but their steps were so watched, that neither she nor Norah could venture to the summer-house; and all her hopes were over.

When the day arrived on which she expected to see Lady Desmond, De Claremont's sister, who had always disapproved her brother's marrying O'Donnel's daughter, her heart died within her, and her pride revolted at the idea of the triumph which Lady Desmond would now enjoy over her; but she remembered that pride suited not with Christian lowliness, and she struggled with the feeling as unworthy of her.

The day fixed for her enforced departure at length arrived; and, at an early hour, De Claremont and Lady Desmond reached Rock Fortress, where the former, pale and trembling, introduced the latter to the equally pale but calm and dignified Mary. Lady Desmond's manner was not only cold, but forbidding; for, having no strong political attachments herself, she could not believe it possible that, unless this favoured rebel was a lover of Mary's, she could have run for him such risks, and exposed herself to such odium; and she could not help wondering at her brother's blind confidence in the virtue of his wife: and no one except De Claremont entertained an opinion different from her's. He, however, had the comfort of judging differently; and he did ample justice to the purity which they questioned.

De Claremont now summoned Collins, and the witnesses into the apartment, and, addressing the former, he told him the hour was come when he should be able to give the strongest testimony that he could give of his loyalty to his king, by separating himself from the wife whom he most tenderly loved, because her conduct had been such as to compromise his loyalty, and also to endanger, as much as she could, the safety of the cause in which he was engaged.

"But, take notice," said he, "that I am convinced that Mrs De Claremont's reputation as a virtuous wife deserves to remain unquestioned, and that her crime has been wholly owing to her devotion to those erroneous politics which she was bred up in, as the daughter of O'Donnel."

"Nay, Eustace, this is too absurd," cried Lady Desmond; "no one will ever believe this but yourself. Collins, as well as I, have heard that Sir Edward Porter is supposed to be the concealed chief of the rebels; and he was to have married Miss O'Donnel."

"Is this true, Mrs De Claremont?" cried De Claremont; "is Sir Edward Porter in this neighbourhood?"

"Not that I know of. I have not seen Sir Edward Porter."

"I believe you," said De Claremont, "for never yet did you tell me a falsehood."

"Ridiculous," cried Lady Desmond. "But why prolong this painful scene; let the carriage be ordered round."

"It is here, and the nurse and child are in it," said De Claremont; "and the two men servants are getting their horses ready, who are to see you safe across the water, and to your aunt's, Mrs De Claremont. Norah shall be sent after you; but, at present, they tell me that she is out of the way. Now, then, let me hand you to your carriage. Collins, go down and see that all is prepared."

De Claremont then approached to clasp his now weeping wife in a last embrace; but she evaded it, and, raising his hand to her lips, exclaimed—

"No, no, De Claremont; a suspected and exiled wife is not worthy of such a privilege. Farewell!"

At this moment a man's footsteps were heard rapidly approaching through the chamber of Mary.

"Hark!" cried De Claremont, "am I betrayed? are rebels lurking there?" And he had only time to draw his sword, when the door was thrown open, and Norah and General O'Donnel appeared. Mary shrieked, and involuntarily threw herself before her father; while De Claremont faltering exclaimed, "General O'Donnel! Is it possible!"

"Thank Heaven! Yes it is General O'Donnel," he replied, "come to await his doom. Foolish girl!" he added, clasping his daughter to his heart, "did you think that your fame was not dearer to me than my own life! and that when Norah told me what was passing, I should hesitate to appear? Mary!" cried O'Donnel, opening his arms to receive her. And the now justified wife, quitting her father's arms, rushed into her husband's; but bursting into tears, she again went back to her O'Donnel.

"I understand your fears, Mary," said De Claremont, "but I have the happiness to believe them groundless. I trust that General O'Donnel has nothing to dread. Surely his pardon will not be refused to me, as the only reward I ask for my faithful services. But I have reason to believe that the bloody decree is about to be rescinded, and that my King is resolved to conquer, not by severity, but by clemency."

"Do not be too sure of that," said Lady Desmond, to whom this scene was by no means satisfactory. But Mary chose to rely upon her husband's convictions, and she ventured to hope.

To conclude: News soon arrived that James had abandoned his rash enterprise—that the rebels had again disappeared—and General O'Donnel received a full pardon, on condition of his residing in France. But he died under his daughter's roof before he could embark, worn out with the fatigues and exertions of his ever restless spirit; and uninterrupted happiness became, at length, the portion of De Claremont and Mary.

On the accession of the Princess Anne to the throne, De Claremont presented his wife to the new Sovereign, who received her graciously, though she was "O'Donnel's daughter."

But while De Claremont and his wife, from the height of their conjugal and parental happiness, looked back upon their past trials, they drew, for the benefit of their children, this moral from their story—That however strong conjugal affection may be, conjugal happiness can alone be unclouded where an entire similarity of sentiments, on the most important subjects, exists between the wedded pair; and where the wishes, interests, and, perhaps, even the prejudices of the wife, are in entire unison with those of the husband.

TO-DAY AND TO-MORROW.

As Time glides on in silent flow,
To-day yields to to-morrow;
To-morrow's expectations grow
To-day's own bliss or sorrow.

Still, as to-morrow's sun appears,
It shines upon to-day;
So, realized, our hopes and fears
For ever melt away!

MADHOUSES, AND THE TREATMENT OF INSANITY.

THE derangement of a late Sovereign of this country, George III., who, after repeated attacks of mental derangement, died in a state of melancholy insanity, in which he had languished for a series of years, strongly directed the attention of medical men to this appalling distemper. Connected with the literature and history of the country, there were, about the same period, yet more illustrious victims to the malady; and, in the early part of the century, the efforts of a few philanthropic individuals giving impulse to the public mind, agitation produced its ordinary good fruits—inquiry; and was followed by a parliamentary investigation into the state of the public hospitals and private asylums for the insane, and consequently to the treatment of insanity. The shocking and disgraceful disclosures made in the Parliamentary Report, farther riveted public attention upon a subject interesting to every human being; and more systematic works upon insanity, as well as letters, reports of cases, &c., &c., appeared within a few years, than had probably ever before been published in this country. The system of moral treatment pursued in the Quaker Asylum at York, THE RETREAT, tended to introduce quite new views of the management of the insane; and several acts of Parliament were passed for the better regulation of madhouses, whether public or private. Yearly licenses were now required, and the asylums were first subjected to magisterial visits, at stated periods, of which reports are ordered to be made.

There is reason to believe that, though the pathology of madness is still very imperfect, and must, in all probability, ever remain so, there is now a somewhat better knowledge of the moral treatment of mental disease; or, if not more skilful, the general treatment is much more humane. The shameful neglect and selfish cruelty, laid bare by the inquiries of 1814, 1815, 1816, no longer exist, could not longer be tolerated in the bosom of society; but the internal management of madhouses will ever require, together with legislative protection and vigilance in the local magistracy, all the influence that enlightened public opinion can exercise. The improvements contemplated by the legislative enactments referred to, have not yet, we fear, been fully accomplished. The long arm of law becomes, after a time, inert or unnerved, where there is neither direct interest nor personal motive to stimulate its exertions. And in lunatic asylums, as in workhouses, factories, and other establishments subjected to legal scrutiny, there is often more which eludes the eye and grasp of law, and lying beyond its reach, than is within its range.

When everything is accomplished that legal provisions can effect, much, if not all, will depend upon individual character; and fortunately this falls, in all cases, considerably under the influence of an enlightened public opinion. The character and acquirements of the teacher do not more powerfully influence his scholar, or those of the commander, his ship or his regiment, than do those of the superintendent of a lunatic asylum the well-being and recovery of his patients. In those retreats of utter helplessness and unmitigated despotism, nearly everything must depend upon the individual who presides, and the keepers to whom he delegates his authority. Of the government of madhouses, it is therefore emphatically true—

“Whatever is best administered is best.”

Among the best administered of those establishments, it has been long understood is that of Dr Fox, near Bristol, in which the moral treatment of insanity has been fancied to be carried to something little short of perfection; while more attention has been given to combined medical treatment than in such establishments as the Retreat, at York; where moral treatment, if not the sole, was the prominent feature of the system of cure.

We beg to be distinctly understood, as of ourselves pronouncing no opinion whatever; insinuating nothing to the disparagement of the particular institution for maniacal patients in which Mr Percival was confined, in our cursory examination of his case. It is probably as perfect in its arrangements, as, in the present stage of medical science in the obscure and difficult department of mental disease, any wholesale establishment of the kind can be; and circumstances alone have made it the scene of our remarks.

A simple narrative of Mr Percival's case, in our estimation, outweighs in value a world of general speculation on the moral treatment of the insane. It is “the single captive” not merely represented to us, but relating his own sufferings and feelings, and from them drawing those practical conclusions which have the authority of experiment. Without pretending to settle the true character of a case of mental derangement, which appears to have baffled those most skilful in the treatment of insanity, (since, even when he left the asylum, the Messrs Fox gave the patient no hope of ultimate recovery,) we may safely affirm that the proximate cause of Mr Percival's lunacy, was unprofitable theological studies, inordinately pursued, and issuing in fanatical notions of religion. These were aided by physical causes; yet so perplexingly are cause and effect alternated or apparently combined and confounded in many cases of madness, that we are glad to steer clear of the bewildering question, and to restrict our remarks and illustrations simply to the one case, as it elucidates the moral treatment of the insane in one of the most celebrated of the reformed asylums.

We are far from considering all Mr Percival's specific complaints of the treatment to which he was subjected, reasonable or well founded, though fully conceding to him the right of judging of his own feelings, and declaring his own opinions; but there is some foundation for many of them, while the general strain of his reasoning on the treatment of the insane, we consider sound and acute; and certainly most important, as it is applicable to every person suffering under the same calamity. There may, we incline to think, have been radical error in the surprise and the coercive discipline to which he was subjected in the early stage of disease in Dublin, which perhaps, as he seems to believe, may have exasperated temporary delirium into confirmed mania; an effect of rash and violent treatment, which, we apprehend, occurs much more frequently than is suspected. Two individuals, for example, are seized with the now frequent malady, delirium tremens—a distemper which, in its symptoms, so closely resembles true mania—which, in fact, for the time, is real insanity, and only to be discriminated by skilful practitioners, from a knowledge of the previous habits and condition of the patient. Of the two individuals we have supposed to be affected by delirium tremens, one is medically treated in his own house, though sequestered from his friends, and in a few weeks, but more probably in a few days, the disorder of his mind vanishes. He may be ill, but he is no longer delirious. The other is hurried away, with every attendant circumstance of surprise and violence, to a madhouse, is subjected to the ordinary routine of irritating coercive discipline adopted for the violent maniac, and becomes a confirmed, it may be an incurable, madman; unless he experience the happier fate of suddenly sinking under the malady and the remedies. Of this frequent result there can, we fear, be little question.

Mr Percival conceives that though his anxious friend, and his physician in Dublin, acted like blind donkeys in a mill, going their round whatever might be the shattered state of the machinery dragged round, they erred in good faith, and unwittingly, when they rashly interfered for his personal security; but he is far from being so charitable in his judgment of Dr Fox and his sons. And these gentlemen may be fairly presumed independent of his indulgence.

Before coming to the few of his specific facts and grounds of complaint which we propose to notice, we shall extract a part of Mr Percival's general reasoning:—

Now, with regard to my treatment, I have to make at first two general observations, which apply, I am afraid, too extensively to every system of management yet employed towards persons in my condition. First, The suspicion and the fact of my being incapable of reasoning correctly, or deranged in understanding, justified, apparently, every person who came near me, in dealing with me also in a manner contrary to reason and contrary to nature. These are strong words; but in the minutest instances I can, alas! prove them true. Secondly, My being likely to attack the rights of others, gave these individuals license, in every respect, to trample upon mine. My being incapable of feeling, and of defending myself, was construed into a reason for giving full play to this license. Instead of my understanding being addressed and enlightened, and of my path being made as clear and plain as possible, in consideration of my confusion, I was committed, in really difficult and mysterious circumstances, calculated of themselves to confound my mind, even if in a sane state to unknown and untried hands; and I was placed amongst strangers, without introduction, explanation, or exhortation.

Against this system of downright oppression, enforced with sycophantish adulation and affected pity by the doctor, adopted blindly by the credulity of relations, and submitted to by the patients with meek stupidity, or vainly resisted by natural but hopeless violence, I had to fight my way for two years, wringing from my friends a gradual but tardy assent to the most urgent expostulations: not from the physicians; their law is the same for all qualities and dispositions, and their maxim, to clutch and hold fast.

If the insulting and degrading treatment I have described, was indeed designed to mortify and probe the feelings, it was preposterous, without explanation, expostulation, or remonstrance; and impolitic without a thorough knowledge of the temper and humour of the individual to whom it was applied. Why was I confined? because I was a lunatic. And what is a lunatic, but one whose reasoning cannot be depended upon; one of imperfect and deranged understanding, and of a diseased imagination? What, then, was the natural consequence of my being placed in the most extraordinary, difficult, and unreasonable circumstances, without explanation, but that I should, as I did, attribute that insult which was heaped upon me to the most absurd causes; to the non-performance of the very acts which in a sane mind I might have condemned; or to the performance of those which I might have applauded. With me, conscience was entirely confounded—judgment perverted. That which others called sin, I deemed virtue; that which men call folly, I called wisdom. What can be said, when I struck, kicked, wrestled, endangered my own security and that of others, as the acts most pleasing to them to witness, most dutiful for me to attempt? The reader now, perhaps, wonders at treatment like this being possible; but if he does not now resent it, in nine cases out of ten, it is not without my having been obliged to reason with him as with a child; so rooted is the prejudice, that lunacy cannot be subdued except by harsh treatment. If he asks why these things are so, I will tell him why; because it is the interest of the lunatic doctors. That is the end. And the cause lies in the servile folly of mankind, of which these lunatic doctors make their profit.

But such treatment is impolitic, not in the lunatic doctor, but in the conduct of such as, in good faith, desire a patient's cure; because, if discovered or suspected, it may work, as it did in me, a deadly hate towards those dealing with me, and a resolution to endure any thing, rather than bow a haughty and stubborn spirit to their cunning, address, or cruelty. In return for their insouciant severity, the mind mocks at their care and vigilance, their respect and their benevolence. The question, then, lies between the power of the patient to endure, and the power of the quack to break his spirit.

Mine was not a solitary instance. Another patient in that madhouse, who, I observed, seldom or never spoke—when one was hinting to me, that he thought the servants were directed to insult and degrade us, or, at least, did it designedly, of their own malevolence—opened his lips, to my astonishment, and declared that when he first came to the asylum, whilst sitting one evening in the parlour wherein we were, he rang the bell, or called for a candle for another gentleman, when the servant came up, and, grossly insulting him, turned him too out of the room, and sent him to bed; since which, says he, I have never opened my mouth, except when absolutely necessary. Upon my pressing for further information, he resumed his silence; and, though his conduct did not appear to me extremely wise, yet I can tell gentlemen who condemn it, that though it is a very comfortable doctrine for the lunatic doctors, and for a set of indolent and inefficient magistrates, to doubt and deny credit to a lunatic gentleman's word, we understand their insolence, and feel their injustice, though we cannot express our opinions, and dare not retaliate. And we beg leave to differ in our opinion. The only resource for the pride of many men is in a stubborn silence, and outward indifference.

A case occurred a few years since which strikingly confirms this reasoning, yet the parties were the most dissimilar possible in education and condition, though each had human feelings:—When a party of benevolent English Quakers were, about ten or a dozen years back, visiting the prisons of Scotland, they stumbled upon a cell in the jail of Inverness, situated in the very heart of that town, in which a lunatic pauper criminal had, for a series of years, been immured, and, as was, indeed, inevitable in such a place, very ill-managed. For years this unhappy and sullen wretch had refused to speak, and it seemed taken for granted that he had lost the use of speech; yet his horrible and unearthly bellowings, and wailing of the one piteous and monotonous Gaelic ejaculation, O God! were familiar to the whole community; so familiar alas! as to pass unheeded. This poor wretch's cry was often continued during the whole night, so that strangers could not at first sleep in that vicinity; and he seemed to take pleasure in disturbing the Sabbath quiet of the town by roaring on Sunday or on the market-day,—though the night was his ordinary time. It was also remarked, that he was peculiarly vociferous during the Assizes, which are held half-yearly in the town—and in a court-house immediately adjoining the jail. At these Assizes he had been tried long before, and his sentence suspended from his evident lunacy. But one Assize passed after another, and if his cries were meant to reach the ear of the Judge, they passed, certainly not unheard, but, to every useful, purpose unnoticed. This is not wonderful, since not one of the thousands familiar for years with that unearthly and monotonous wail, ever seemed to think of the lunatic as a human being. The jailers, and those public functionaries whose duty it was to examine the state of the prison, gave him credit for both malice and cunning, especially when, in spite of their admonitions and threats, he persisted in bellowing during the Assizes, to the scandal of the community and the disturbance of their honours, the Magistrates. And probably he did retain as much intellect as to foster indignant hate against those around him,—though, treated like a caged wild beast, he had become thoroughly brutalized. A miracle seemed to be worked when this unhappy being, for the first time, after years of sullen endurance, opened his lips and bosom to the Quaker party, and related, or attempted to relate, to those benevolent persons, his feelings and his wrongs. By their humane interference he was cleaned and clothed, and transferred to a lunatic asylum in Aberdeen, in a condition so greatly and suddenly ameliorated, as to astonish his former conservators.

Mr Percival imagines that his health was somewhat improved in the first days of his residence in the asylum of Dr Fox; and he supposes that the abruptness with which his brother left him among strangers, in circumstances so painful and embarrassing, and the dreadful discovery of where he was being left to the workings of a deranged imagination, was one cause of his becoming worse. Again and again he reiterates the complaint that the mere fact of his insanity appeared to give every one who had to deal with him a right to act as it seemed good unto himself, in defiance of nature, of common sense, and of humanity.

There were, at this time, a good many patients in the common parlour, each of whom he invested with a spiritual character; and indeed the same individual often bore several characters and names, though he never seems to have forgotten or confounded their personal identity. He presumes that the promiscuous association of the lunatics in the common sitting room disturbed all their minds; nor, can common sense discern any reason for unhappy persons, in all stages of insanity, being thus herded together, save, perhaps, the imperative one of economy. It would also appear from Mr Percival's statements, that the Messrs Fox mingled comparatively but little in a scene, where one would imagine the presence of a presiding person was at all times most necessary. After describing some of his fanciful illusions, all begotten of gloomy and perplexed notions of religion, he tells—

In the midst of all this confusion of triple or quadruple persons in one and the same individual, and of my understanding, that according as my spirits warned me, I was either on earth as it was when I left it, or in heaven, or in an intermediate state of felicity, I was desired to act and to do my duty, and accused of guilt in pretending not to know what was my duty, and resisting the desire of the Lord to learn of my spirits. I might well be puzzled. I might well have been puzzled, setting aside that delusion. For it might be a trial for a very wise man to act discreetly, on being ushered, by violence or guile, into a room full of gentlemen who spoke nothing, did nothing, or muttered a few half sentences to him, without being informed of the nature of his company and of his position amongst them. I had no introduction, no explanation, no reason assigned me for my position; lunatic, imbecile, childish, deluded, I was left to divine everything. Precisely that conduct likeliest to aid deception of the mind, to encourage and to make it perpetual, was pursued towards me, and is now being pursued towards those wretched companions I have left behind me, and to tens of thousands in a similar state.

My earnest desire, my intense inward prayer to the Deity whom I imagined conversing in me, was, "Oh! take me home, Oh! take me to E—g. I shall never know what I am to do here; all is so new, so strange, so perplexing. If I were one fortnight, one week, three days in the library at E—, left to myself, I should know how I was to act—what I was to do." My brothers, my sisters, and my mother were always in my thoughts; my constant longing was to be with them.

I, a nervous patient, was confined in a large room with eleven or more others, nervous patients also, and servants, and certain of them occasionally raving, stamping, bawling, violent madmen. The mental agony, the distress, the actions of these wretched men, their quarrels with one another, their struggles with the servants, the servants' rude and cruel manner, my own weakness and follies, and the violence they brought on me, all were exposed to me, and I to them. I was confined also amongst these men, hand and foot. Often left alone for hours with two or three of them. I, weak in body, weak in mind, not able to support fear, or to control it as another, and, besides, overwhelmed by superstitious fears. This was my position for six months, until after hay-making, and then for six months more with the difference of not being tied up. All this was under the direction of a surgeon, a physician. A surgeon attended the asylum, and surgeons came with the magistrates to inspect.

In obedience to the spirits, he had attempted to waltz with one of the patients, and he was perpetually instigated to wrestle with the keepers. He became violent, in short, and was thenceforth constantly tied up in a niche of the common sitting-room. This was the order of his melancholy mornings. Immediately on being brought down stairs—

I was taken to my niche, seated down, and fastened into it by a strap with a small padlock, that ran through a ring in the wall, which ring could be turned round. My tea was placed before me, at breakfast time, in a slop basin, on a small deal table, with a plate of bread and butter. And usually one hand was loosened from the strait waistcoat; at times I was fed by the hand. It was always a great delight to me to get my hand at liberty, even for a moment, and the first use I usually made of it was to strike the keeper who untied me; directed by my spirits to do so, as the return he (the attendant) desired above all things else, because he knew I was proving my gratitude to the Lord Jehovah, at the risk of being struck myself. My blows were usually received in good humour.

Cold bathing and the shower-bath, to which he was sometimes exceedingly averse, were a principal part of the remedial treatment; and probably, in one view, with the utmost propriety; although, in another, its advantages became problematical, from the extreme excitement which it often caused to the patient, and the horrors which his distempered fancy associated with his baths. It must, however, be admitted that he was liable to be similarly affected by whatever agents or means were employed in his cure. And when he was not disturbed by the strange sounds and sights in the common parlour, the sense of hearing, in his private apartment, became his tormentor. We leave the medical reader to adjust the balance between the fury and irritation produced by the bath, with its attendant circumstances of indignity, and its physical benefits. At first he submitted quite passively to this as to everything else.

They used to take me to the bath after breakfast, the spirits called to my mind their horrid threats in Dublin, and bade me understand, that this was the bath of boiling water, in which I was to be plunged for all eternity; I was threatened with finding it so, if I did not obey my spirits, or before I descended to it, reconcile them to me, by suffering something for their sakes. Two or three circumstances led to a confirmation of this delusion. In the first place, the bath was in gloomy rooms like cellars. In one room, in which I was usually dressed and undressed, there was no window at all, and the walls bare; in the other two, the light came from small windows at the top of the wall. We passed along passages to get to them, in which I saw large iron pipes, like the apparatus of steam-engines; and these I was told were to convey the hot water to the bath. I was occasionally seized hand and foot by two men, and thrown suddenly backwards into the bath: and I did not know what need there was for that violence, for I never hesitated to enter it. On one occasion, Simplicity stretched out an iron bar to duck my head under the water by pressing it upon my neck; for the men seemed to think it an essential part of their extraordinary quackery, to have the head well soured. After ducking my head, he held the bar out to me in sport, and I seized hold of it, and found it quite warm, as if just taken from a fire. I attribute this now to the extreme coldness of my body in the water; for often, for half an hour after I came from the bath, I shook and shuddered, and my teeth chattered with cold; on these occasions I was usually fastened for a time alone in a large wicker chair, in the parlour I had originally been confined to. But at the time, I conceived the heat of the bar to be a proof to me accorded in mercy of what my spirits told me; that I was really in the bath of boiling water, concealed from me by their agency, but ready, on my provoking the Lord beyond redemption, to be instantaneously revealed to me. On another occasion, I entered the bath rooms after some other patients, when Herminet Herbert shewed me a leather mask, which in sport he offered to put on me, and asked how I should like to go into the bath with it? Now my spirits had threatened me with being plunged in, after having my face covered with a pitch plaster. So these trifling incidents aided my delusions.

In everything, as will be seen, he found food for his lunatic imagination, the bath among the rest.

I may also add, that on one occasion, when I went to the bath, Herminet Herbert asked a man who was there—whom I afterwards, if I am not wrong, found out to be a bricklayer (one of the baths there appeared to be undergoing repairs)—to help him to throw me into the water. We had come down stairs alone. Usually, the hulking fellow I called the Holy Ghost, or Kill-all, came to my bed-side, about half-past six in the morning, to help to take me down, for I almost invariably resisted going down, not from my own notion, but by the command of my spirits, as doing the thing most agreeable to the attendants. I was told that this man was another personification of the Holy Ghost, and another Kill-all. For that as Diana was worshipped in two forms, as DIANA and HECATE, so the Holy Ghost was the destroyer of those in hell. I saw this man, one day, in the passage, and his face was for a moment of a preternatural red or flame colour. He was at that time at work in a cellar opening in the front of the house, where I was made to believe that a cold bath was being prepared for me, into which I was to be plunged and immured in the dark; and to be always sinking and drowning to all eternity. I used to long to look down that cellar to see if it was true that preparations were really going on for a bath, but I never had an opportunity.

Sometimes the keepers lost temper and patience at the unaccountable perversity of the sufferer, in the freaks he exhibited or attempted in obedience to the spirits, and occasionally they struck him with "ferocity and spite." Generally, we should say that, even by his own shewing, if not over-delicate nor much alive to the refined feelings, they were forbearing and humane. One powerful man, however, though generally good-humoured and civil, was often provoked to strike him with violence; and truly does he say:—

Unfortunately, his punishment was of no use to me. I understood that I was punished for feigning, not for my act of faith, and the blows were another chance for my being at last miraculously at home, or in heavenly places. They only tended to disturb the equanimity of my mind in attempting to perform the duties required of me by my spiritual Mentors. Receiving their voices as the commands of my God, nothing could prevent me attempting to obey those commands, however absurd they might appear to myself or others, or dangerous to myself. The awful impression of dread produced by preternatural menaces; the compunction I felt for former acts of ingratitude; the appeals to my attachment, sense of honour, sense of duty, made by my spirits; the hope of redeeming millions of souls by one act of obedience, and of standing in the presence of Jesus and his Father, were too strong for me to resist. Experience alone of the falsehood of the promises could succeed in making me relinquish altogether my attempt; and that experience was long in coming, for fear or embarrassment continually made me prevent or lag behind the instant of execution; and then the failure of effect was attributed to my not acting with "precision and decision."

Returning to the common room, I always attempted to wrestle with, or asked one of the patients to wrestle with me. I was then locked into my seat. If my arms were at liberty, I would occasionally seize one or two of the patients to wrestle with me as they passed by me. I had no malicious motive; I did it in obedience to inspiration, and imagined they were inspired to know what I was commanded, how I obeyed, and how to act in consequence. My attempts at wrestling were, however, inculcated by the spirits on more practical grounds than ordinary. They told me that it was necessary "for the keeping me in a right state of mind," in other words, "to keep my head to my heart, and my heart to my head." I used to ask several individuals to wrestle with me, with a view to their giving me violent usage, a severe fall and the like, and with the secret hope that during the wrestling, one or other of them would strangle me or cause me to suffocate. I always seized the strongest men; and it is a singular fact, whilst I compelled the other keepers to struggle with me, I never did more than lay hold of the waistcoat of him I called Jesus, the weakest, unless when I was struggling with three at a time. The men usually held my arms, joked with me, begged me to be quiet, and used no more violence than was requisite to overcome me. Three keepers usually came to compel me to go to the cold bath, which to me was a mystery, because I was not aware force was required to take me there, and I was told I might go to the bath with Simplicity, or Sincerity, or Herminet Herbert, according to my conduct. But in reality it was, I conclude, a display of force to intimidate; in which it failed through my delusions, for it provoked my efforts. But it answered another purpose, that my foolish opposition did not meet with such cruel violence as the spite or fears of a weaker party might have inflicted on me. Sometimes I was carried along in sport neck and crop; but usually I did not meet, on these occasions, except from single hands, with ruder treatment than might be expected from three country fellows overcoming resistance: on one occasion only I recollect a stick being brought out to beat me, but I do not recollect its being used. I am not sure.

When consigned to my seat, it became again a question how I was to employ myself. I felt in this position a sense of suffocation, which together with former delusions, suggested to me the idea of suffocating myself by pressing my nostrils against a wooden projection in the wall serving as an arm to the seat. This in fact was my chief occupation all the day long, occasionally varied by my attempting to twist my neck, standing up as well as I could and leaning on the back of my head, the face turned upwards against the wall, and then turning my body as on a pivot from side to side. Occasionally an old patient put a newspaper on my knees to read, and Herminet Herbert once or twice gave me one of the Registers. Sometimes my hands were untied for a short time to read them. In the morning, and always in the afternoon, certain of the patients smoked and sat down with the servants to a game at whist. Scarcely a word was spoken except in broken sentences, or by the servants, which added to the apparent mystery of my situation. Once a day usually, one or more of Dr F.'s sons came into the room and stayed five or ten minutes: he addressed one or two patients, and occasionally said a few words to me; but always with a half-and-half manner of speech and deportment, which added to the conviction I was under, that they too came for a mysterious purpose. Occasionally they smoked a cigar in the room, and played a game at cards. I was told that one of these gentlemen was my brother D., and his name Sincerity and Contrition; the other, my brother H., and his name Joviality; he was an amiable, good-looking fellow; the other, melancholy and besotted. I occasionally asked these and other well-dressed men to wrestle with me, but I did not attempt to force them, in spite of my spirits, for they were too well dressed, too decent, too childish. Generally every Sunday morning about ten o'clock, Dr F., the father of these young men, tattered in; a gray-headed, firm-charactered old man, of short stature, with a blue frock coat on, broad brimmed hat, and long cane. But to me all was delusion; I thought him a spiritual being; I called him my father.

About eleven o'clock every day, the patients were taken out walking, if the weather was fine, and I went out for an hour with Herminet Herbert, or was left tied up alone. Dinner came at one; in the afternoon the patients again went out for a walk, came home about four, went into the yard or sat down in the room till seven, when tea was brought and served the same as the breakfast; after which, they were taken or went alone upstairs to bed. Besides this, during the day they were occasionally taken out one by one, either to the bath or to be shaved, but I then understood when they went out singly, they went either to suffer, or to supplicate for me; when they went out together, they went as a court of justice to consult on my case.

When I was first fastened in my niche, my feet were at liberty, but afterwards they also were fastened by leathern sockets to a ring in the floor. There were two or three reasons for this, or rather causes; for had my treatment been reasonable, there would, I conceive, have been little reason for any personal confinement at all.

There was good reason for this irritating restraint; for the patient, in obedience to the spirits, was become exceedingly mischievous and troublesome. He would upset the table and dishes, by every possible contrivance; with his feet, when his hands were tied, and, when his feet were fixed, with his mouth. Nearly all his actions were intended as atonements for sin; and he would kick off his shoes into the room, and "wait, in silent faith and prayer, for the shoe to come back!"

When first taken out for exercise, he called out after every carriage, that it was his mother's; and every young woman he fancied one or other of his sisters. Actuated by inspiration, he would then cry aloud—"I am the last hope of a noble family!—I am ruined!—I am ruined!—I am lost!—I am undone; but I am the redeemed of the Lord Jehovah—the Lord Jehovah Gireth," &c. &c. He notices this Row-like exhibition to complain, reasonably enough we think, of being dragged through the villages and farm-houses, along with the other mad gentlemen, "like a string of wild-geese." When he was very noisy and vehement in shouting, the keeper would rebuke or ridicule him, or strike him with his cane.

I recollect on one occasion, I ran away in the grounds from the keeper, who had desired me to keep by his side. He caught me by an iron fence in the grounds, and with great violence doubled me over it. On another occasion, looking up into the sky, I saw a vision of the Lord descending with the angels and saints. Several times, the sounds of the cattle lowing, or asses braying, in the fields, conveyed to me articulate words and sentences, as to Balaam. I was often made a joke of in good humour by the keepers, on account of my delusions, and this added to their strength, for I took seriously what they said in jest. For instance, one said to me, "there's your father, go and run after him, and take him by his arm;"—pointing to a patient I took for my father; another, whom I called Scott, but whose name was Marshall, replied one day, "I am called Scott in good company."

When he returned from exercise, he was, of course, tied up in his niche, the prey of the horrible fantasies whose nature we formerly described. Night was ever an appalling season to the unhappy patient. It had been judged necessary to tie his feet as well as his body and arms when in bed. How dreadful, in every way, is such necessity!

Fastened thus, lying on my back, I passed my wretched sleepless nights for nearly, if not quite, nine months! Recollect too that I was a nervous patient! I had not exercise enough during the day to procure sleep, but I lay exhausted, wearied, agonized, terrified in my spirits, hungering after rest, but unable to procure it. To add to my feverishness and misery, the servant usually tied my right arm so tight, passing the thong twice round it, that it cut my flesh, causing a red ring round the arm in the morning.

I never complained; the voices told me it was Jesus who did it, and that he did it for my good, to prevent me going to sleep, because sleep would torpify me, and as I was a spiritual body, I did not need sleep. Sometimes, however, by order of the voices, I asked the servant when he came to bed to undo my right arm; which was occasionally done. In the coldest nights I used to kick off, or throw off with my teeth the clothes, yet I never felt cold.

This restraint was kept on a great while longer than was necessary. A lunatic doctor, in one sense, is pretty sure to be on the right side; he will run no risk that will do his reputation for security an injury. . . .

After I was in bed, from about eight to ten o'clock, when the keeper came up, I very often used to shout out aloud or sing the psalm, "O be joyful," in obedience to the demon's commands. Then Simplicity would come up, and with his open hand strike me on the face most cruelly—all I could do, tied hand and foot, was to turn my face to the wall, to avoid being struck in the eye, or on the nose.

He relates that he used to be in an agony of fear, calling to his spiritual attendants to save him, while expecting the keepers to come in to take him to the bath. What sane mind, however fanciful, ever imagined a condition of being so terrible as this, which, with many even more sublime in horror, he describes:—

I recollect now a sensation of fear, a sense of cruelty, which I cannot yet define, as the men came up stairs and entered my room to untie me. Their footsteps talked to me as they came up stairs, the breathing of their nostrils over me as they unfastened me, whispered threatnings; a machine I used to hear at work pumping, spoke horrors; besides this, there were some ducks and chickens came to be fed before the window; a breakfast bell rung, and I heard a piano down stairs: all these circumstances reminded me forcibly of my boyhood, and I think my mind was afflicted with speechless agony, at the comparison of my actual state with that of my infancy, childhood, and youth; to have been so loved, or so duped by the appearance of my family's love, and to be so abandoned in the greatest woe, under the most awful state of misfortune. But I accused myself of all, and chiefly for bringing discredit upon the new doctrines of the Rowites, on my own sincerity as a professor of religion, &c., thereby endangering the salvation of those dearest to me, by alienating their affections from, and shaking too their confidence in, the truth. The dinner bell used to ring to me many changes.

As part of the necessary treatment, (for it would be folly and guilt to talk of the punishment of a man in the state of Mr Percival,) he was upon one occasion placed alone in, what he describes, as a wretched sort of out-door cell or shed, strapped down upon a dirty straw mattress, and manacled to the wall. His reasoning upon the supposed utility of this treatment, or corrective punishment, deserves the close attention of those who undertake the management of the insane. The presence of his elder brother at this crisis completely removes all blame from the doctors, were any imputable. They best understand the utility of such measures; the humane spectator can only lament their necessity.

Mr Percival, with the previous nice and probably fastidious habits of an aristocrat, (of which order his saintship never surmounted the prejudices,) and an officer of the Guards, complains that personal neatness, if not cleanliness, were neglected in his case. His feet were not once washed, which was cause of complaint when reason returned; and he found that he did not get enough of fresh linen, though apparently there was quite enough for substantial cleanliness, though probably not enough for his previous habits. But if we find the Emperor Napoleon squabbling with his keeper about towels and wash-hand basins, we may surely make some allowance for the irritable temper of this unfortunate gentleman, and his aptness to take and remember offence at those small slights and indignities that were certainly not intended as such. Yet we should imagine that the previous personal habits and tastes of insane patients ought to be so far carefully studied, as to prevent the feeling of insult and irritation on their returning to a sound state. When about the worst, Mr Percival had his feelings or his conscience shocked when, upon seeing himself accidentally in the glass, he perceived his head so shaven, that it resembled the tonsure of a Roman Catholic priest. When he got better, he was equally shocked to miss those luxuriant whiskers of whose curls he had from boyhood been so proud. These seem trifles, and they are so, yet not below the attention of those who assume the management of the insane. With some men, habit will outlive reason. In this asylum there were assembled, in the same common room, persons who still remained neat and clean in their personal habits and dress, and others as slovenly and careless. One of the first visible symptoms of Mr Percival returning to his senses, was the request that his feet might be washed.

He had other and more substantial causes of complaint than the want of silver forks and a sufficient number of towels and pocket handkerchiefs. There is, however, ample vindication of the petty neglects and insults to which he was exposed, if his theory be correct, that this was done systematically, in order to probe and arouse the patient, sinking into apathetic imbecility, and, by affronting and angering, to preserve his faculties from torpidity. Petty and even serious insults were, if we understand Mr Percival aright, intended to act on the patient's sensibilities, as a kind of perpetual mental blister. It was the object of the doctors to establish a raw in the mind, which they might touch at discretion to keep him alive. The idea of this moral irritant is curious and far-fetched, perhaps altogether imaginary. If it were real, Mr Percival's argument falls to the ground when he contends that his indignation, when he came to his senses, at these personal indignities is justifiable; since, whatever was their ultimate object, they were real insults. But if intended to assist in his recovery, if a branch of the moral treatment, he has certainly no more right to resent their employment, than to get into a passion at the bath or the blister, meant to aid in his cure. Little or almost no medicine was employed in his case, if his own recollections be correct; and another symptom of his returning sanity was to ask for really useful medicine, which he obtained.

Of one circumstance he complains, which does look exceedingly absurd. When nearly at the worst, he was "taken to church," as it was called. The laundry of the establishment was fitted up as a chapel on Sundays, and thither the patients were taken, the Doctor's family and female patients being divided from the rest by a screen. On some of them this exhibition might have had a soothing effect; on Mr Percival's mind it had quite the reverse. He went, he tells, with the feeling that he was to attend a kind of condemned sermon each time; and he, accordingly, behaved extravagantly, and was turned out "for disturbing the congregation."

The rough, abrupt, brow-beating questionings, and the system of surprises, is to him another ground of complaint, and, we consider, justly so.

A case lately fell within our own knowledge, which we mention here, as illustrative of that system of surprising and fluttering lunatic patients which Mr Percival repudiates. A young lady of about the age of seventeen or eighteen, fell into listlessness, low spirits, despondency, and religious melancholy, which ended in confirmed lunacy. Her intellect was supposed to have been injured, if not deranged, by the Row affair; but, the symptoms were very opposite from those of Mr Percival. She was humbled, self-abased, despairing, and, so far as we remember, though obstinate, never violent. After being for a considerable time medically treated at home, this interesting girl was, by the earnest recommendation of her physicians, and to the great grief of her family, removed to a celebrated lunatic asylum. The advice was, in all probability, exceedingly proper. She was sinking into torpor, which might have become idiocy, and we make no question that, in the early part of her residence, she derived great advantage from the systematic treatment of the asylum. She began to recover, but several years passed, and she was never sufficiently recovered to be restored to society, or even to her family. She at length corresponded with her father and sisters, like a person in full possession of her mental faculties, and she praised her keepers. She drew, embroidered, and, with the convalescent or harmless patients in the house, attended the neighbouring church. There was always apprehension expressed by those who had the charge of her, for the exciting effect of seeing any of her brothers or sisters; but, when she had been about six years in the asylum, she was visited by an elder sister, in the fond hope, which the tone of her letters excited, that she might be taken home. Her sister was not, however, all at once permitted to see her; and, no doubt some preparation might have been needful had there been no other cause than their long separation and the distressing domestic calamities which had taken place in the family during that time. But her elder sister was placed so as that she might observe her in church; and there her manners were as gentle and decorous, her dress as neat and proper as that of any other young lady. Her sister was afterwards permitted to watch her in the garden-grounds of the asylum, and rejoiced to see her apparently in good spirits and playing with the children of the superintendent.

The sister of the patient naturally looked forward herself with some trepidation to the delayed interview, which was finally managed in the way which Mr Percival justly calls "cruel surprise." She was abruptly ushered into a parlour where the patient was found alone, and entirely unprepared for the interview; the lady of the house calling out, sharply—"Here, Miss—! here is your sister come to see you!" Is it in human nature that this poor girl, always timid and sensitive, should not, in the circumstances, have been flurried and alarmed—trembling and silent? She was not permitted time to recover herself, when a farther hurry was given to her probably weak spirits:—"Hey, Miss—, I think you are not very kind to your sister, who has come so far to see you!"

Finally, as a quiet boarder in the establishment, it was found that this poor young lady was quite happy, and as much at her ease as her state permitted, but that her removal was not yet to be thought of; and, though half-murmuring, and far from being satisfied with the rough test of the "surprise," the sorrowing sister returned to tell her heart-broken father that his youngest and favourite child was not fit to be brought home. We do not—we are not entitled to give an opinion upon the system of abrupt communications and surprises applied by mad-doctors as a probe or test of the condition of the apparently-recovered lunatic; but, at all events, the employment of a means so liable to abuse, for the promotion of the most nefarious and selfish designs, ought to be very strictly watched.

By fitful gradations, and after frequent exacerbations, and lapses, "matter and impertinency mixed," the lunacy of Mr Percival subsided. Sometimes he was groping, and trembling, as it seemed, on the very verge of reason, of that half-felt something, which yet eluded his grasp. We formerly noticed a stage at which the spirits began to sing to him, "You are in a lunatic asylum if you will, if not you are where you please;" "That is Samuel Hobbs, if you please; if not, it is Herminet Herbert, the Saviour:" and, at last, by hearing the other patients calling this man by his true name of Samuel Hobbs, and by other accidents, he began to think that he was yet on earth, and in natural, though very painful circumstances. Once, his elder brother, when on a visit to him, tested his soundness of mind, by asking him to explain a proposition of Euclid, which he comprehended perfectly well, but could not explain consecutively. When taken to a particular point to walk, which commanded a fine view of the valley and the river, he says—

The view was enchanting; but I looked down on the people working and the boats moving in the valley with feelings that they were dead to me, and I dead to them, and yet with that painful apprehension of a dream, that I was cut off from them by a charm, by a riddle I was every minute on the point of guessing.

As his madness departed, it was replaced by excessive indignation against his friends and his physicians. To himself this resentment yet appears natural and justifiable. Natural we grant that it may be, nor is it without palliation. When he first began to write, incoherently enough, to his family—though to write at all was a great step gained—his rage was excessive to find that the most cherished secrets of his heart, and what he still imagined the dealings of the Spirit of God with his conscience, must first be subjected to the scrutiny of the mad-doctors. And if such scrutiny had really been necessary, surely some expedient might have been found to spare the patient the knowledge of a fact so humiliating and torturing. His first letters home were probably more sane in matter than in manner. He complained of the usage he had received, and insisted upon having a private apartment, and a servant to himself. Vague, evasive replies came, as might have been expected; and he was in an agony to find that, of the vital parts of his letters, those concerning the Row doctrines, and his own notions of his spiritual condition, no notice was taken. He wrote other letters which were not forwarded; and his exasperated feelings at what appeared the cruel neglect and indifference of his friends, and his agony of suspense and despair at their silence, must have, we think, produced a most perilous mental state. We are far from considering all his complaints reasonable, but who can resist his pathetic appeals for himself, and those in his most compassionate condition.

They who have not been confined in a lunatic asylum, cannot conceive the dreadful and cruel suspense that delay, and not only the neglect, but the refusal of everyday civilities, together with inattention to just and obvious complaints, occasion. They do not know our wants and fears, because they do not know the danger we are in. They may judge our danger, however, from what these men do; and from what they have done, they may judge what they dare to do: being encompassed, even more than a king, with a hollow impunity, and clothed in the deepest hypocrisy. They who have not endured this confinement do not know that the very suspicion of being a lunatic, coupled with being cut off from all pecuniary resources, shuts the minds of others against sympathy, impedes the proffer of assistance and the exercise of protection, and aught but the show of pity. Neither how it embarrasses the suppliant in his applications for redress, awakens anxiety, excites mistrust, and closes the door of his hopes; whilst he finds himself left defenceless to the sarcasm and persecutions of those he is accusing. This is an awful peril for a man in a sound mind to be exposed to, lest he become deranged: lest he be tempted to violence, the object of his tormentors, which would then be construed into an open act of insanity; and if not immediately accepted as damning proof, by imbecile magistrates, at least cruelly try the mind, by tantalizing the expectations. How much more fearful is such a trial for one who knows that he cannot plead innocence of lunacy; one who, in mind and bodily health, is weak, and thereby more exposed than another to follow a wrong course; exposed to suffer even from treatment which men in sound health might almost laugh at, still more from that which he dreads from having experienced it, and against which he is exasperated; and also, still more liable than the other to lose that gift, lately lost, so dear now, being newly restored to him—the gift of a sound mind, and convalescent health; perishing again from want of wholesome communion, shattered by assault, or insidiously undermined.

By this time I had broken off all friendly intercourse with the Drs F.

Previous to this period, he, from time to time, had been invited or ordered, with what he sometimes felt to be too little ceremony, to dine with the family, and the presence of the ladies now restrained his bursts of temper. Mr Percival complains, and with good reason, that private communications from their families were made in presence of all the patients, and that they were obliged to read their letters and write in the common room. Some of his observations on the circumstances attending the visits made by the distressed relations of the patients, strike us as exceedingly just; and those especially on the concerted surprises which are adopted, though written under great excitement, strike us by their justice and force.

In June, about the time of hay-making, my eldest brother, on his way from T— after his election, called to see me. I was unfastened, led into another patient's room, and dressed in a new suit of clothes, like a boy at a private school, and taken into the entrance-room to see him. After speaking to him, some gooseberry pie was offered to me; and then I walked out with my brother and the keeper; tried to throw myself over the stiles as usual, and came home.

My brother was evidently agonized at my appearance. His visit gave me self-confidence, and ensured me some respect. More advantage might have resulted from it, had my situation been more becoming. But a visit of this kind, and the style of delivery in which communications were made from our families, and the patients requested to reply to them, are instances of the mockery and treachery of such a system in a madhouse. By placing you in an unnatural and cruel situation, and at the same time counselling your friends to keep aloof from you, in presence and in letter, they create the feelings which render it impossible for a man in a sound mind to receive intelligence from them at last, without extreme agitation: then they abruptly communicate that intelligence, or hand the letter to the patient, and neither consulting his modesty nor his distress, deny him a little retirement to read these lines in private. His feelings, at a time that he is declared incapable of controlling them, are thus called upon, in the very circumstances, from the cruelty of which he ought to have been preserved, by those from whom he hears, for which they ought at least to express their sympathy and regret, if not atone and apologize. But, no; the letter contains a mere meagre account of every day occurrences; cold, unmeaning, paltry trivialities, trifling with the time and tone of a mind whose imagination is strung up to the highest pitch of delicate and romantic enthusiasm. The violence, or agitation, or ridiculous conduct that ensues, is then attributed to the receipt of the letter, instead of to the brutal heedlessness with which it is delivered. But this is in favour of the doctor. Another apparent cause is given for withholding at least, if not denying altogether, one rational means of a patient's recovery; and, however specious may be their conduct and their excuses to mankind and to themselves, their end is to make money, not to make whole; and their system is adapted in one way or another to this end: whilst the essential interests—the mental wants of the inmates of their prisons—are neglected. It stands to reason. Tie an active-limbed, active-minded, actively imagining young man in bed, hand and foot, for a fortnight; drench him with medicines, slops, clysters; when reduced to the extreme of nervous debility, and his derangement is successfully confirmed, manacle him down for twenty-four hours in the cabin of a ship; then, for a whole year, shut him up from six A.M. to eight P.M., regardless of his former habits, in a room full of strangers, ranting, noisy, quarrelsome, revolting madmen; give him no tonic medicines, no peculiar treatment or attention, leave him to a nondescript domestic, now brushing his clothes, sweeping the floors, serving at table, now his companion out-of-doors, now his bed-room companion; now throwing him on the floor, kneeling on him, striking him under all these distressing and perplexing circumstances; debar him from all conversation with his superiors, all communication with his friends, all insight into their motives, every impression of sane and well-behaved society! surprise him on all occasions, never leave off harassing him night or day, or at meals; whether you bleed him to death, or cut his hair, shew the same utter contempt for his will or inclination; do all in your power to crush every germ of self-respect that may yet remain, or rise up in his bosom; manacle him as you would a felon; expose him to ridicule, and give him no opportunity of retirement or self-reflection; and what are you to expect? And whose agents are you—those of God or of Satan? And what good can you reasonably dare to expect? and whose profit is really intended?

Gentlemen of England, the system I have described is not only the system of Englishmen, it is the disgrace of English surgeons, of English physicians. . . . Be assured, whoever ye are, who have to deal with children or lunatics, if you are not looking after them yourselves, you are not respecting them. The doctors know that, and take advantage of it, to construe your disrespect into worse even than it is. Their servants take advantage of it. Bystanders draw false conclusions from it, much more the poor object of it. His nature resents it, though he is not always aware of anything but his delusions; and his delusions contending with his feelings for the mastery over him, make him a madman. . . . I am sure that no lunatic who has undergone the trials I describe, can meet his family on terms of cordiality, but through practising dissimulation, or through being a simpleton. At this distance of time, I cannot forgive my family the guilt they incurred by their abandonment of me. I am at a loss to find any argument which will justify me in doing so: I dare not expect to be able to do so. But if, haply, perfection requires this moral excellence, by what happy fortune are you entitled to look for it in the inmates of a lunatic asylum?

I have complained that the behaviour adopted towards me, was calculated to humour the state of mind I was then in, not to correct. The servant, for instance, whom I used to call Jesus, and Herminet Herbert, ran with me, jumped, joked, walked arm in arm with me, rattled the spoons in my face as he put them into the cupboard, pulled me by the nose, &c. &c. If I was not insensible to the impropriety of this familiarity, at least, I could not express my sense of it. But it will be evident, this was not the way to correct a gentleman's diseased mind. . . . I observed the joke ceased whenever the domestic had had enough of it. The lunatic's presence of mind and tranquillity might be broken in upon, but not so the keeper's. There was but one step from joking with them to violence and oburgation. Later in the year, a young handsome lad used to invite me to box with him every evening in my bed-room, striking me in sport a few blows: at length, I expressed a kind of awkward resentment at it. I have perhaps written enough on this subject. . . . A lunatic appears insensible, but his is, perhaps, the most alive of any mind to ridicule, and to the contemptibleness of his state.

As Mr Percival began to recover, like many a man, even while deranged, he became acutely sensitive to the observation of strangers; and trying to avoid their gaze, he would say to himself:—

Then the physician is unconscious that we have any feeling, and is mistaken in his system. I felt the hopelessness of my situation, at the same time that I saw how necessary seclusion was for my happiness and peace of mind, to preserve me from acts of folly.

From what I state, it will be obvious how improper for many patients any exposure, or any conduct likely to draw attention on them in particular, must be. Nature tells a man, who has any great grief, to be for a time secluded. Nature makes a man, sensible of any great infirmity, seek retirement, still more under such an awful infliction as insanity, when from the proud station of a reasonable being, he is degraded below the beasts of the field: fallen from his throne; bereft of his dominion. Nature, however, comes not into any part of the doctor's plans, but self-interest. He does not consider what is the sanest treatment for the sufferers, but what will attract most customers. They see the patients apparently unconscious to the shame of their situation; and that conduct, which really proceeds from an unacknowledged sense of it, they look upon as a sign of the specific disease they labour under. They act then according to that they find, instead of reflecting that want of sense is probably part of the disease, and that it is their duty to restore a sense of propriety by more regard on their part, not to harden the feelings by constant exposure. . . .

When I began to make remonstrances with my family, I complained of the absurdity of their having allowed me to be exposed in this manner, at the same time that the professed object of my being detained so far from home, was the desire pretended for my retirement, to save my feelings in not meeting my friends. . . . When the propriety of my being in retirement was again recurred to as an argument, to prevent my confinement in London, or in a neighbourhood where I hoped to meet those who would truly befriend me, since my relations, on pretence of duty, delicacy, or decency, abandoned me to the malice and economy of the doctor, I replied, that such an argument was sheer mockery; that not my pride, not my delicacy, not my modesty were being consulted, not my care for privacy, but my family's desire to hide me; for otherwise they would make my privacy effectual by placing me in a private family as I required; and whether was it better to have my griefs and infirmities exposed to friends who would enter into my feelings, respect, pity, and protect me, or to the strange tenantry, strange household, strange patients, and strange visitors of a doctor perfectly unknown to me, except through his stupid inhumanity.

These are long extracts. It would wrong the subject to which they invite attention, to suppress or abridge them.

Mr Percival finally made it a request to his family that Dr Fox should permit him to walk in the kitchen garden, where he was not liable to be gazed at by strangers. This was permitted; and his mother requested that, after his personal freedom had been restored, he might be allowed also to work in the garden. Later in the year he was employed, along with other two gentlemen and a keeper, in cutting a path in the shrubbery, and entrusted with a mattock and a spade. While at work, a troop of the dragoons called in to quell the Bristol riots, passed, exercising their horses on the road. The sight, and the oaths of the soldiers, excited him to tears and psalm-singing. "The sweet bells yet jangled;" but he was fast recovering, and was even sensible to the jokes of the keepers at his expense and his general conduct was becoming rational.

One day, at this time, he met a doctor, who had bled him in the temporal artery, under circumstances of restraint and violence, which he remembered and resented. Some of the spirits whispered him to attack the doctor, but other impulses prompted him to forgive; and these prevailed. He shook hands with him, saying, "O sir, I have been in a dream—a fearful dream—but it is gone now!"

Mr Percival gives an account of the chief companions of his calamity, with singular minuteness and graphic power. Our readers have, we imagine, never before had so close and true a view of the interior of a lunatic asylum presented to them, but we cannot venture upon the group. Yet we may remark that if epileptic and nervous patients, through sympathy and imitation, affect each other, the insane, in all the varying stages and modifications of mental distemper, are surely equally liable to such influences; and hence a strong argument is derived against their intimate association, especially while idleness induces them to watch and imitate each others actions and words.

Mr Percival reasons upon the absurdity of a system of treatment which drives men, in self-defence, to conduct which looks like insanity; and inquires pertinently enough—

Do you expect from him, from him whom you confine expressly for his weakness and deficiency, an example of fortitude, a pattern of self-denial, perhaps not to be found in the annals of human nature? By reason of your own conduct, your judgment if honest and scrupulous must be in ambiguity; for you can never tell if the patient's eccentricities are the symptoms of his disorder, or the result of antipathy to the new circumstances in which you have placed him.

To prefer walking out in a cold drizzling rain, as one patient did, to sitting by a warm fire-side, may, in ordinary circumstances, look like madness; yet there are cases in which the sanest man would be driven to such a resource, to escape from his noisy lunatic companions into solitude and peace. Further, Mr Percival remarks, with some truth—

To halloo, to bawl, to romp, to play the fool, are, in ordinary life, signs of irregularity; but they become necessary to men placed in our position, to disguise or drown feelings for which we have no relief; too great for expression, too sacred for the prying eye of impertinent, impudent, and malevolent curiosity. I will be bound to say, that the greatest part of the violence that occurs in lunatic asylums, is to be attributed to the conduct of those who are dealing with the disease, not to the disease itself; and that that behaviour which is usually pointed out by the doctor to the visitors, as the symptoms of the complaint for which the patient is confined, is generally more or less a reasonable, and certainly a natural result, of that confinement, and its particular refinements in cruelty; for all have their select and exquisite moral and mental, if not bodily, tortures.

Mr Percival complains that the patients had no place in which to place their books and other effects, not so much as a single drawer, with a key to it, not even what boys have at school; and he repeatedly condemns the magistrates for the careless indifference with which they perform the duty of visitation and examination in madhouses, remarking that if they plead that they walk by the statute, then must there be another statute that will aid humanity.

The case of one unfortunate gentleman is related, who seemed to have been so much in possession of his intellects, that one feels surprise why he remained longer in the asylum. We have noticed the disappointment and exasperation which followed Mr Percival's attempts at correspondence with his family. One of his brothers had visited him in the mean time, and certainly appearances were not favourable. Yet he was more sane than he appeared, for he was now scornful and full of resentment. His mother, whatever were her tenderness and anxiety, and they appear to have been great and incessant, was compelled to submit to the judgment of the doctors as to the propriety of the patient having a private apartment, so he became desperate about this time, struck at the servants, and vowed to murder some one of them if he was not removed from that madhouse ere three months were out. It was evidently no longer a place for him. Admitting that his complaints were often frivolous, the petty insults and indignities he received wore to him the real character of serious evils. While in the most exasperated state of mind, he again wrote, probably more coherently than before, and detailed some of the personal indignities to which he had been subjected.

This sad tale now hastens to a conclusion. When the magistrates visited the asylum, he appealed to them, and was gently put off as a lunatic. He complains that not one of them had the humanity or delicacy to listen to his statements in private.

I had to speak in presence of nine or ten magistrates, servants, and doctors. None had the delicacy to withdraw, no one had the gentlemanly feeling to desire to see me in private. They stared with impudent and unmeaning curiosity. Nay, I have one exception to make. Captain W., confined like me as a lunatic, left the room; he afterwards apologized to me for being in it, saying, he was unaware of what I was going to speak about, but that the moment he heard me he retired. I thanked him, and told him that I should have been glad, amongst so many unfeeling, stupid, and suspicious judges, to have had one honest, clever, and gentlemanly witness to my complaints and demeanour.

There was certainly both method and good sense in the measures he now took for his emancipation, and also to be revenged on his physician, for he openly avows the desire of revenge.

In order to succeed, I desired first legal assistance to set forth my case and to save my rights; secondly, to be taken to London to be for a short time under the care of a surgeon who had known me from a child, that he, witnessing my state of mind and body, and hearing my complaints, might be able to argue and to give evidence concerning the necessity of requiring me to use the cold bath, at that inclement season, the propriety of using force considering the degree of understanding I was restored to, and the danger to my health of body from the shock and cold, and to my mind from the needless excitement. These requests were denied.

To his mother, he wrote in this strain:—

Though I knew I was still lunatic, yet I knew, too, from sad experience, that I was capable of taking care of myself in a more reasonable manner than the wretched physicians she confided in; that I was not a lunatic incapable of controlling myself, although I felt so sensible of my need of observation, that I would not accept my liberty if it were given to me, but should place myself immediately under the eye of some one I could rely upon; but that if she insisted on placing me where, under pretence of observation, I should be defenceless, open to violence, impertinent intrusion, indelicate treatment, and deprived of tranquillity, peace, rest, and security, I should claim my freedom, though lunatic, as one not mischievous, and hold her responsible for my future detention. In taking this resolution, I was actuated also by the desire of convincing the consciences of my mother and of my family, to see the sin they had been guilty of.

I might as well have appealed to the winds. I received letters from my elder brother and his wife, canting about submission, patience, and the Holy Spirit; to which I replied in mockery and disdain. I knew that my patience had been proved in a fire they could not have stood under for a moment; that it had not given way until they had neglected my representations, and made me desperate; and they talked to me of patience, ignorant of facts and circumstances, whose business it was to have humbled themselves, and to have applied patiently for information to me. They wrote to me of the Holy Ghost, they by whose conduct I was driven well nigh, and at last altogether to blaspheme the holy name of God, and to doubt his Providence. They talked to me of my Heavenly Father's will, who if they had allowed their stubborn stupidity, and hypocritical reliance on the doctor to have been pierced by one cry of agony, ought to have known that they were already guilty before my Heavenly Father of that perverse will by which I was abandoned, through which I was destroyed, and wander about the ruin of what I was, and to which I was still compelled to address threats, argument, and representation. Another wrote to me, actually defending the doctor in opening my letters, taking the part of my enemy, and reasoning against me. I was so disgusted at his indelicacy and presumption; for he always wrote to me as if he knew what lunacy was, not I who had endured it, therein proving the stubborn and innate lunacy of human nature, rushing to give an opinion where nothing is known to found a right opinion upon; that I wrote on the note a few laconic lines to say, that I returned him his note, and that until he changed his mind and expressed his sorrow to me for having written it, I could not have any communion of spirit with him, and therefore desired not to speak with him.

When, indeed, I desired my correspondence to be respected, it was from feelings of delicacy towards my family, as much as to myself. But I met with no delicacy in return. I wonder at their insensibility, how that intelligent and sensitive souls can become so besotted.

This is strong language, dictated by bitter and wrathful passions and vehement indignation, with which, nevertheless, the reader must in some sort sympathize. Sometimes Mr P. employs more intemperate language; and he may not, any more than the calmest and wisest of mankind, be the fittest judge in his own cause, but at all events we hold him to be a fitter exponent of the feelings of a lunatic, than any physician who ever observed or wrote, unaided by personal experience of what a distempered mind really is. Here is a man of evident talent, able to say—"Thus I felt; such was the effect upon my mind of the conduct of those around me, who treated me, at best, as a stock or a stone." The formidable fact remains, that, under the alleged mistreatment, he recovered. He asserts, that it was in spite of it that his constitution triumphed over the distemper; and it is singular that, when he took his departure, one of his medical attendants pronounced him incurable.

My constitution triumphed over riot and severity, where peace and indulgence were required; and my mind, by its own efforts, shook off the appalling chains of delusion: these wise, clever, at least cunning men, heaped every obstacle in my way to health, in my return to sound society. Climbing out of the well into which they had thrown me, the stones fell down upon me, wounding and crushing me in my advance, or hurling me again to the bottom.

The clergymen of the established church ought to have the superintendence of the mental wants and infirmities of the deranged members of their communion, and the two offices of physician to the body and physician to the soul, distinct in nature, should be equally respected. Sovereigns in this country, their ministers, and the people, have been guilty of a great crime in neglecting this important distinction, and the hierarchy have betrayed their office. Yet who can wonder at that, who knows how they are appointed?

We must draw to a close with this singular case, and more remarkable narrative. We have treated it more at length than is our custom with topics of so grave a nature, but the original work is not likely to get into many hands; and we are at a loss to decide whether, at this existing crisis in the religious world, an exposition of the species of infatuation and wild fanaticism, which was, if not the original, yet certainly the exciting cause of Mr Percival's frenzy, be not as important, as his remarkable contribution to the existing scanty and imperfect knowledge of the moral treatment of mental derangement. Errors he has undoubtedly exposed in the existing system, which seems based upon the entire annihilation of the mental and even the sentient nature and powers of the patient; which seems to assume that the maniac is merely so much animated brute matter, to be taken to pieces and set agoing afresh by the plastic hand of the physician.

LITERARY REGISTER.

THE ANNUALS FOR 1840.

The first covey of the annuals has taken wing; but as we wish to allow all of them the advantage of a fair start, we defer our customary notice till next month. The most novel circumstance that has yet transpired about them is, that Mrs Howitt succeeds Miss Landon as editor of the "Drawing-Room Scrap Book." Fisher and Sons have come forth in great force,

SERIAL WORKS.

A new work is added to the multitude which promises to surpass most of them in interest and entertainment. It is entitled the "Encyclopedia of Rural Sports"—a title not sufficiently comprehensive for the design which extends to all ages and nations. The author is D. P. Blaine, who is not new to the public in this walk of literature. The "History of Field Sports" is to be completed in ten parts. It is copiously illustrated with spirited and characteristic wood-engravings. It combines natural history with the chase; and displays a vast fund of reading and wealth of material. The only objection that can be brought to the work is a rather small type.

Yarrell's British Birds.

The last part we have seen is devoted to rooks, jackdaws, magpies, and their congeners; birds about which there is a good deal to tell in the way of delightful gossip. The engravings are as elegant as ever.

Rose's new General Biographical Dictionary.

A second Part has appeared. As the notices are generally, from the comprehensive nature of the plan, very brief, we consider that the value of the Dictionary might be greatly improved by occasionally referring the reader to more copious sources of information. This applies chiefly to the biography of learned or eminent foreigners, as the notices of the English worthies are pretty full.

Paul Periwinkle.

This is a lively bustling tale of the sea, in the manner of the Box school, appearing in Numbers, and illustrated with humorous designs—the pen being no longer able to stand, it would appear, without the support of the pencil. It is by the author of “Cavendish.”

Heads of the People.

The Head of the Heads announces a new series. This concludes with undiminished vigour and spirit, with a paper on the Printer's Devil, a functionary of old standing and great repute in the world of letters. The sketch is written by Jerrold in his happiest vein.

Life of Nelson.

A part or half volume of a reprint of Clarke and Macarthur's “Life of Nelson,” lavishly adorned with naval portraits, has been published by the Messrs Fishers, exactly in the style of their “Life of Wellington.”

The Voluntary System.

This is a Prize Essay, written in reply to Dr Chalmers' late Agitation Lectures on Church Establishments. The author is the Rev. Joseph Angus, the pastor of a Dissenting congregation in London. The prize, of one hundred guineas, was offered by The Protestant Society for the Protection of Religious Liberty, and was adjudged to the author of this treatise by the Rev. Dr Raffles, the Rev. Dr Pyle Smith, and William Tooke, Esq.—a sufficient proof, we conceive, of its merits.

From the notes and illustrations appended, we learn that the number of what are called Protestant Dissenting chapels in England and Wales is about 7,500; but if those of Catholics, Jews, Quakers, and Unitarians be included, then the number is 8,700, attended by at least three millions of persons. The money raised, voluntarily, for the support of the Dissenting clergy, averaging their salaries at £120 a-year each, is about a million; but the average of £120 is probably too low—certainly it would be much too low if applied even to poor Scotland. This is independently of what is spent in building and repairing chapels, &c. The Dissenting body raise upwards of another million yearly for missions, schools, Bible societies, and benevolent institutions. They pay from fifteen to twenty thousand a-year for the education of their ministers. The Quakers—a small body numerically—are compelled to pay £14,000 a-year to the State Church—are “spoiled of their goods” annually to that amount. The sums which the Dissenters must pay to the Church—the “millions” paid would, as here stated, soon cover the whole country with meetings. We must glean a sample of the Essay, though it should only be a brief and mutilated one!—

Every country in Europe has had its Puritans—men bearing a closer resemblance to the early Christians—against whom the malice of the populace has been directed, by the same arts of calumny and detraction, and, in all instances, by the same church, the endowed. Catholics, Protestants, Churchmen and Dissenters, have been alike guilty. Once vest them with State power, and, in self-defence, they become “Papists” and, if possible, crush every opposite sect. If they have influence with the legislature, and if the minds of men be “sleeping,” they impel it to persecute; or, if that expedient fail them, they try to stir up the popular mind by contrivance and management—a kind of persecution more serious, as it cripples the usefulness of the sufferers without awakening on their side the sympathies of the virtuous.

This animosity of the endowed we reckon among the essentials of an establishment, because its causes are permanent. The interests of the favourite sect, and the interests of the dissenter are ever opposed. That each man is bound to exercise his judgment in matters of religion, and to acknowledge no other guide; that the emoluments of Christian ministers should be confined to the voluntary contributions of the people; that the religion of the State is not necessarily the religion of the subject—are maxims so obviously consistent with reason and Scripture, so clearly involved in dissent, and so grossly violated by the existent system, that it cannot be but feared “The Church” will vanish before them. Under these circumstances, the worth and the devotedness of Dissenters serve only (we speak of tendencies) to make them more hated, because more formidable. Had they been immoral only—Papists in sentiment, Atheists in practice—they might still have been regarded as the sons of the Church; but now they are “worse than heathens.” Their dissent is a crime that must be abandoned before it can be forgiven. It will be observed that throughout we have looked upon Establishments, not so much as they are, but as they might be, if human nature were perfect, power never abused, injustice never resisted; and, even under this form, it has been found that they are eminently anti-Christian and unjust. By patronising one sect or opinion, they punish all others. They compel all to contribute, for the maintenance of the opinions of the endowed, money and influence; while they deny to the Dissenter, who believes his own faith to be the faith of the Bible, all share in them. In Italy the penalty of dissent is proscription or imprisonment; in Spain it is banishment or death; in England it is loss of influence, of property, of character; in all, men are punished for doing as God has commanded—searching the Scriptures, and judging for themselves—for exercising one of the most sacred prerogatives of our nature; a prerogative which it is both impiety and injustice to invade.

Following out this line of argument, the essayist shews that the influence of State churches is always unfavourable to the liberties of the People; that under tyrannical governments dissent is almost wholly unknown, and that in our own country the clergy have ever been the enemies of freedom—that High Church is the epithet applied to arbitrary maxims of State policy; and, lastly that Guizot has lately declared that unless Catholicism is established in France, the throne of the barricades, the “semi-despotism” of Louis Philippe, is insecure; “No Bishop, no King,” is indeed an old maxim. But the influence of State churches, also fosters the spirit of rebellion; for if Government be against its subjects, it must be expected that the subjects will be against the Government. Our author, after shewing the immense evil which the violation of the principles of toleration, or of full religious equality, has inflicted upon Christian countries, and upon mankind, by bloody wars and persecutions, proceeds to shew the injurious effects of established or dominating sects to Christianity; and then to the refutation of the special arguments of Dr Chalmers, Mr Gladstone, and the other modern advocates of Establishment. His reasoning is throughout close and lucid—a great advantage which he possesses over some of his verbose and resounding opponents.

A Manual for Mechanics' Institutions.

This volume is published under the superintendence of the Society for the Diffusion of Useful knowledge. It treats of those subjects most important to the successful establishment and prosperity of Mechanics' Institutions. It commences with a brief history of the origin of these useful associations, and deals at large with their various objects, internal regulations, and economy. Rules for government, outlines of lectures, and a catalogue of books (which we fully agree with the noble chairman and the secretary in thinking a very imperfect one) are given, and a great variety of miscellaneous information, and valuable hints are brought together. It appears the leading defect of nearly all these institutions, that but a small proportion of the whole members are either mechanics, or operatives of any class. Their main body appears to be shopmen and clerks. But it is good to have any class of young men brought within the reach, and under the influence of knowledge, and in the way of forming good habits.

We, for many concurring reasons, recommend this book to the attention of the promoters of early and adult education. There can be no question about the excellent intentions of those who put it forth; nor yet that a few months of wholesome agitation, personally carried on by them throughout the country, would do more to farther their object than all the volumes they can put forth. George Fox, John Wesley, John Howard, Thomas Clarkson, nay Mr Owen and Mr O'Connell, are all aware of this fact, and had they not acted upon it they had never, by all their written and published epistles, founded sects and effected grand reforms. The parts must be more strongly moved before they will respond to the central body. One proof is, that to a circular addressed by the Society to the various Mechanics' Institutions, and similar bodies in Great Britain, very few answers have been returned. If the schoolmaster would be greatly effective, the schoolmaster must come abroad.

An Inquiry into the Morbid Effects of the Deficiency of Food. By Baron Richard Howard, M. D.

We have here a powerful if indirect argument for the abolition of the Corn-Laws; and the taxes on meat, butter, cheese, &c., &c., by a medical practitioner in Manchester, and physician to some of its charitable institutions. No possible situation could afford the medical observer on the evil consequences of deficient food—whether moral, physical, or intellectual—a wider field of investigation. Among the consequences of deficient food, is the languor and final decay of appetite. Were the gnawings of hunger continued to be experienced with the same acuteness that they are felt upon incidental privation, by those who are at all times well fed, Dr Howard is of opinion that hunger would break through stone walls, and “that violations of the law would be much more frequent, during periods of general distress, than they are now.” The array of evils which he musters, as the consequence of deficiency of food among the working classes, is formidable and even appalling to humanity. This alone is the direct cause of many diseases; and, in particular, of nervous diseases, low fever, infant death, from various diseases, and of the death of old people, and of poor women nursing their children too long. To deficiency of food Dr Howard imputes much of the listlessness and torpor of the mental faculties remarked among the labouring poor; and the moral effects are equally certain and deplorable. The ill-fed man “becomes gloomy and spiritless; his physical exhaustion so paralyzes the energies of his mind, that he has neither the disposition nor the power to make an effort to assist himself; and he would rather doze away his time, and perish, than rouse himself to any exertion.” Dr H. aptly illustrates the depressing influence of inadequate nutrition on the mind by several passages from Captain Franklin's narrative. Under our title of “An Able Medical Argument for the Instant Abolition of the Corn-Laws,” we commend this treatise on the prevalence of starvation among the working classes, to the especial attention of legislators and landowners.

Everett's Memoirs of the Rev. Daniel Isaac.

This book will be of considerable interest to the Wesleyan Methodists, among whom Mr Isaac, a man of strong character, was an eminent and influential preacher. It gives considerable insight into the domestic life of the lower and middle classes of England. With their flocks, the Methodist preachers come into more intimate contact, and interfere more in their personal and private affairs than any clergy, save the Romish priests. Mr Isaac did good service at one period in putting down, at considerable personal risk, a secret association of a dangerous nature, among the colliers. They were organized into “The Brotherhood,” as they termed it, about the same time as the Luddites, and for nearly the same objects. The single object of all combinations of colliers seems a rise of wages, or more pay and less work. It is idle to describe them as political. But though Mr Isaac acted the part of a Boanerges in putting down their unlawful and mischievous societies, he was the true friend of his flock. Once, while he was stationed at Leicester, a season of great commercial depression occurred, and the Rev. Robert Hall and Mr Isaac preached and made collections, in behalf of the sufferers, throughout the winter. Trade became brisk when the spring set in; and the masters now wished the men who had been starving for want of work to labour night and day: “No,” said Mr Isaac to the men, “twelve hours are sufficient for any man to work; proceed farther, and you will again glut the warehouses, and your masters will reduce you to seven shillings a-week, and place you where you were.” His sympathies were always on the side of the working-man, though his opinions were sometimes erroneous. He imagined—strange delusion!—that the Corn-Laws keep up wages. Mr Isaac was, notwithstanding, a man of strong common sense, and of rough John-Bullish humour. Among his antipathies was the modern system of female boarding-school education for the middle classes. “I have but a poor opinion,” he once said to a friend at Sheffield, “of the present mode of educating females. Mackintosh receives lessons in French, music, and dancing, at some £50 a-year, without any probability whatever of the said accomplishments being rendered available to any future advantage. It suits neither a rich nor yet a poor man's daughter;—too little is attained frequently in the former class, and too much in the latter. Oh, I quite forgot the hearth-rug and the bell-ropes! Half-a-year and £20 spent in fabricating bell-ropes! I tell thee, Friend Welch, for half the money, I could buy as much rope as will serve Newgate and the Old Bailey to the Millennium!” Among his many controversies,

Mr Isaac, "the polemic divine," had one with the provincial Phrenologists, where triumph was, perhaps, not difficult. He teased them by asking where, among the powers of the human mind, the Governor, the Regulator, Reason, was located?—and accounted for all the nonsense of the New Science from Reason having no local habitation, either in the creed or on the skull. Though not without some of the small blemishes, or rather distinctive marks of his sect and calling, Mr Isaac was both a good and an able man, full of life and energy; possessing and exercising the power of independent thought upon most subjects.

The Heavenly Doctrine.

Charles Louis Duke of Normandy, the son (soldier) of Louis XVI., taking the hint of Guizot, has come out upon the world in the character of the founder of a new faith! It is neither that of St Simon, of Baron Swedenborg, nor Joanna Southcott; but one specially revealed to this unfortunate scion of royalty, who, we suppose, is the same individual that was nearly assassinated a few months back, though he seems to bear a charmed life. The revelation of "The Heavenly Doctrine" was made to the Duke by three Angels. He put a variety of questions on points which troubled him, and received detailed explanations and new lights upon the whole New Testament, in a series of friendly familiar dialogues with the said angels. The revelation is literally translated from the French of the Duke, by one of the disciples of "The Heavenly Doctrine," Charles de Copan. We fear the angels are (doctrinally at least) not quite orthodox; and, indeed, their avowed object is "to expose the errors and impostures of the Church of Rome," on which they preach some clever short sermons. The angels seem to have very little faith in, or respect for, the revealed record of the Acts of the Apostles; and of the whole of the Epistles the angels give a new free translation. This divine revelation concludes with a scheme of ecclesiastical polity and internal church discipline which contains some excellent provisions, whoever suggested them. Though there are to be no dignitaries in "The Catholic Evangelical Church"—the only title being Pastor—its affairs are to be administered by a supreme Central Council, the members of which are to receive £2,000 a-year each for their labours. This curious summary of "The Heavenly Doctrine" is subscribed by two persons, formerly Roman Catholic priests: a lawyer, formerly a Catholic, and the Duke himself, as "PROTECTOR OF THE CATHOLIC AND EVANGELICAL CHURCH." It is right to say, that we have given this divine revelation of "The Heavenly Doctrine" but a very hasty and cursory perusal, though we do not misrepresent it. The Duke has had many more revelations. Some concerning the future state of the soul, and other obscure points; but his interpreter justly thinks that "The Heavenly Doctrine" should take precedence, and that one branch of the revelation is enough at a time.

The Life of Marcus Tullius Cicero. Family Library, No LXIX. Tegg, London.

This life is written by Mr Hollings, whose memoir of Gustavus Adolphus lately struck us much, by the unexpected liberality and enlightened philosophy with which the memoirs of a military hero were treated.

The memoirs of the great Roman orator and statesman are comprehensive, and compiled with talent, pains, and judgment, and with that amiable prepossession for the hero, which always contributes to the agreeableness, if not always to the fidelity of biography. This is altogether a volume which may well supply the place of more bulky and ambitious works.

Memoirs of George Fox. 12mo. Pp. 323.

Because, as we presume, the remarkable founder of the Quakers' Society never attended any University, and knew not a word of Greek or Latin, he has been regarded by nearly every writer on the history of religious sects in this country as far beneath Wesley and Whitefield. At best we can imagine no other reason; for in original power of mind, in flaming zeal, and indefatigable energy, he equalled, if he did not surpass either of those eminent men. That the sect which he founded in the face of far greater difficulties than those with which the first Methodists had to contend, has not become much more numerous, we take to be owing partly to the strictness of its social discipline, but in a much greater degree to the want of a regular and paid body of ministers. The experiment of George Fox was a bold one; but the world was not ripe for it, nor is it yet ripe. Quakerism was a religion too spiritualized for the multitude. It was the antipodes of Popery, a faith without a ritual; or, as its opponents have falsely said, without a worship. Hence the Society of Friends, though always a highly respectable body, has never increased its numbers. Nor are we certain but that there were numerically as many Friends, and Friends' meetings towards the close of the career of George Fox, as at this day. It is a small sect, and uses no means to extend itself; instead of which, the world says it has become apathetic and exclusive.

This memoir of Fox is not by any means a perfect work. It would appear to have been compiled by different writers, and a very long historical preface it would have been better to have abridged, and thrown part of it into the Life. The Life is properly an analysis, with very copious extracts from other memoirs, and from Fox's diaries and narratives. Probably, from reverential feelings, the writer has withheld nearly everything characteristic of the early years of Fox's ministry, when his enthusiasm often took the shape of extravagance or madness. Yet it was madness with method, and adopted to bring the doctrines which he taught into notice. He often travelled with a friend, and on coming into a town, his fellow apostle would preach in the streets, and be arrested before George had left the inn. "He would soon learn the fate of his friend, and by a bold remonstrance against this uncourteous treatment of strangers, obtain his release."—"Such occurrences gave opportunity for discourse with the principal men of the place, drew the people about them, and thus furnished opportunity to impress the doctrines of truth with good effect." The modern Quakers have apparently abjured all the eccentric practices of their Founder; that "bold soldier of Jesus Christ," who walked intrepidly into the steeple-houses, the courts of justice, or the chamber of the First Magistrate, denouncing all unrighteousness, and proclaiming the truth of the Gospel in its uncorrupted simplicity.

The volume contains an epitome of the doctrines and discipline of the Quakers, which are nearly the same as Fox left them. He started as a reforming apostle in the year 1645, at the age of twenty-one, with very slender attainments, but with a native force of character and ardour of temperament which hid the defects of his education until he had surmounted them. In the course of his incessant travels, George Fox visited the West Indies and America. He planted societies both in Ireland and Scotland, and frequently visited them. The first person that joined him, the second Quaker, was a woman named

Elizabeth Hooton in Nottinghamshire; and other members were received, whom the Friends would now, we imagine, feel some scruples about receiving. What meek, peaceful Friend of our days, would come forward testifying against the covetousness of the clergy, or deploring that merchandise was made of the Gospel, clergymen receiving pecuniary recompense for preaching, and leaving their flocks and places for a higher salary, pleading a call to the Lord "so to do." The first Friends were a strong-hearted and plain-spoken people. "Oh," says Fox, "the vast sums of money that are got by the trade they make of the Scriptures, and by their preaching, from the highest bishop to the lowest priest! Which trade in the world is comparable to it, notwithstanding the Scriptures were given out freely?" Fox, in the course of his long ministrations, suffered many severe imprisonments, but no persecution could quell his zeal. When a young man, a clergyman, advised him to smoke tobacco and dance with the girls; or, as another account goes, to sing psalms, in order to banish his despondency. Once he had an interview with Cromwell, who seemed as if he desired to gain him over; and when he was discharged from one of his many imprisonments, ordered him to dine with the company at Court. But Fox would not "eat of his bread, nor drink of his drink." When the Protector was told this, he said—"Now, I see there is a people risen that I cannot win either with gifts, honours, offices, or places; but all other sects and people I can." This was, indeed, a sect not likely to increase. Keeping on the hat, and refusing to take oaths, or pay tithes, were the cause of incessant persecution to the Friends, besides those other causes from which every class of Dissenters then suffered. Once, while Fox was in prison, a Friend went to Oliver Cromwell, and offered to lie in prison himself instead of Fox, if the Protector would accept him. Cromwell turned to his Council, and asked, "which of you would do as much for me, if I were in the same condition?" George Fox seemed to have real pleasure in posing and irritating the clergy at their frequent interviews, both by his questions and replies. As he advanced in life, his extravagances of conduct were corrected, but his zeal and piety never knew abatement. We could have wished for a better popular Life of this extraordinary man; but this, with all its imperfections and omissions, possesses great value.

Guide down the Danube from Paris to the Mediterranean, from Vienna to Constantinople, &c., &c., &c.; also, The Route to India by Egypt.
By R. T. Claridge, Esq. New Edition.

A useful book this, we make no question, to those who are about to take the journeys to which it affords a guide; but, though its descriptions are lively and comprehensive, they are, from its plan, too concise for stay-at-home people. This is no reproach, but rather a commendation to a Guide-Book. One most useful feature is tables of charges, which no Guide-Book should be without. As a specimen of the minute nature of the work, and a curiosity in its way, we copy out the nett disbursements of a journey from London to Constantinople, by different routes:—

DISBURSEMENTS.

In order to shew clearly how the journey sketched out in the following pages is to be made at the very moderate cost assumed as the maximum, viz. £100, it will be necessary, first, to fix a sum for daily hotel expenses; and next, to point out the cost of conveyance from one point to another.

It is difficult, if not impossible, for one person to determine the expenditure of another, for in travelling, as in all other things, that depends upon individual disposition and taste. The object of these remarks, therefore, is to direct those who wish to see a great deal, at the least possible cost, consistent with comfort and enjoyment, and who, having resolved upon a journey of this description, for the purpose of making themselves acquainted with the physical, domestic, and political state of the various countries embraced in it, are prepared to conform to the customs of their respective inhabitants; to join the public tables, where such are to be found; and, in fact, whilst at "Rome to do as Rome does."

This being assumed, the ordinary daily outlay, in most of the states through which the traveller will pass, may be estimated pretty accurately as follows:—

1.—France—excepting the capital—bed, 1s. 8d.; breakfast, 10d.; dinner, including wine, 2s. 6d.; tea, 10d.;—5s. 10d. a-day.

2.—Switzerland and Lombardy. At expensive hotels here, the bed is 2s. 6d.; the dinner, 3s. 4d.; other things being about the same as in France; making 7s. 6d. a-day.

3.—Belgium, the Rhine, and Germany. Here the expenses are 20 or 30 per cent. less. The steam-boats on the Danube are well served at the following charges:—breakfast, 9d.; dinner, 1s. 6d.; supper, 1s. 3d., wine included;—3s. 6d. a-day.

4.—Orsova, where two or three days are passed, bed, 10d.; breakfast, 4d.; dinner, 1s.; supper, 16d.; 3s. the day.

5.—Galatz to Constantinople. While on board the vessel, the cost will be one dollar a-day; in Constantinople, where articles are considered dear, the cost will be double this sum.

6.—At Smyrna, there are several excellent boarding-houses, the charge at which is one dollar a-day.

7.—At Athens, where there are several good hotels, the expenses, while remaining there, will not exceed two dollars a day. On the journey from Athens to Patras, and whilst there, provisions will not cost more than a dollar a-day.

8.—From Patras to Marseilles, Trieste, or Ancona, on board steamers, the charges are 5s. a-day; but if quarantine be finished on board an Austrian brig, then 2s. a-day is charged.

Thus, when the number of nights spent in travelling—the trifling daily expenses incurred in descending the Danube—the non-necessity for extra expenditure on board ship—and the absence of all occasion for excess in Greece and Turkey, are taken into account, an average of one dollar (4s. 2d.) a-day, will be seen to be the maximum of the cost for provisions, domiciles, &c.; and as parties are supposed to lose no time in reaching one of the places of embarkation, viz. Marseilles, Vienna, Ancona, or Trieste, three months will be ample time in which to complete the tour. But in order to provide for servants and other contingencies, 8s. per day is assumed as the amount of expense; and as every facility is now afforded for moving from one place to another, the calculation of time made will be found ample for the purposes of completing the journey. Thus, those who understand travelling, and who desire to undertake an economical journey, will be able to determine how far this may be effected; while those unaccustomed to it, will perceive that something is allowed for their inexperience.

Let us now sum up these separate expenses:—

Provisions, &c. for three months, at 8s. per day,	36	0	0
The expense from London to either of the three places of embarkation differs but little, none exceeds	12	0	0
From Vienna to Orsova,	3	18	0
Carriage from thence to Mehadia and back,	0	8	0
From Orsova to Constantinople,	7	18	0
Guide for a week at Constantinople,	1	10	0
Horses for self and guide to Belgrade,	0	8	6
Visit to Broussa and back,	4	4	0
Horse to the Giant Mountains, from Scutari,	0	3	0

Carry forward, £66 9 6

Brought forward,	£66	9	6
Steam-boat from Constantinople to Smyrna,	3	7	2
Horses for self and guide from Smyrna to Ephesus and back,	1	5	0
Steamer from Smyrna to Syra,	1	16	0
Syra to Athens,	0	16	9
Guide two days in Athens,	0	8	0
Boat to Egina and Epidorus,	1	0	0
Two horses to Napoli di Romania,	0	8	6
Carriage from Napoli to Argos and back,	0	5	0
Horses for self and baggage to Corinth,	0	8	6
Boat from Corinth to Patras, touching at Salona, and horse from thence to Delphi and back,	2	18	0
Patras to Trieste, touching at Corfu,	7	10	0
From Trieste to England,	12	0	0
	£98	12	5

To this let us add a visit to Zante, and from thence to Corfu and Ancona, by the steam-boat, instead of going direct to Trieste; this would be an additional expense of, . . . 3 14 0

Making a total expenditure of, . . . £102 6 5

Thus, it will be seen, that a single traveller, (whose individual expenses are greater than they would be if he travelled with others,) though diverging from the direct route and taking the best place in the public conveyances, and denying himself nothing to make his journey of the most agreeable description, would find, upon his return home to England, a small balance remaining out of the £100 set apart for his tour; or if he made the additional trip to Zante, &c., the excess would be about £2.

COST ON THE USUAL ROUTES.

1.—London to Paris,	£	s.	d.
Paris to Marseilles,	2	2	0
	3	6	8
	£5	8	8
2.—London to Paris,	£2	2	0
Paris (by way of Geneva) to Milan, (140 francs,)	5	16	8
Milan (by way of Geneva) to Venice, (33½ francs,)	1	7	11
Venice to Trieste, by steam-boat, (22½ francs,)	0	18	9
	£10	5	4

There are three or four more routes to Vienna laid down, but these we need not notice. The estimated expense of travelling is about the same by each—about £10. The route by Paris and Strasburg is the most expensive—that by Frankfort and Munich the cheapest; for France is avoided.

History of the Campaign in France in 1814. Translated from the Russian of A. Mikhailofsky-Danielefsky.

It is a new and good thing under the sun to see English literature indebted, in any shape, to Russia. The author is not only a native Russian general, but a member of the Imperial Senate. He acted as an aid-de-camp to the Emperor Alexander in the campaign which he describes; and the reader may be tolerably well pre-assured that nothing will be found in his narrative that can by possibility offend any Russian Emperor, past, present, or to come. The narrative, indeed, glorifies the whole Russian army. We have not much space for extracts, but one must be given as a curiosity. The Russian general having elaborately shewn that the defeat of the Russians, with great loss, in the affair of Champaubert, was entirely owing to "the erroneous dispositions" of Old Blucher—and, if his statements are received at their given value, to something more culpable than error of judgment in the veteran—he proceeds:—

Prussian writers, in their desire to justify Blucher, lay the blame of the disaster on Olsooffef, who, having received positive orders to take Champaubert, could not decline fighting. Blucher's glory will retain its lustre for ages, even if he made a few mistakes in the course of his brilliant military career. His laurels will not fade, and we do homage to them with the greater pleasure that they were mostly bought with Russian blood. Napoleon desiring to see Olsooffef, invited him to sup with him; but, as the general had difficulty in expressing himself in the French language, Napoleon sent for Poltorasky, and the following dialogue took place:—

"How many were you in the field to-day?"

"Three thousand and ninety men, and twenty-four guns."

"Nonsense!—that cannot be; you had at least 18,000 men."

"A Russian officer does not speak nonsense—I have told you the truth; besides there are other persons from whom you can learn the same thing; then, I hope, you will be convinced Russians do not lie."

Napoleon scowled, and, after a short silence, said—"If what you assert be true, it may be said, to your honour, that Russians alone can fight so desperately; I could have pledged my head you were at least 18,000."

"For all that, I am a prisoner."

"What does that signify; your Emperor has fifty of my generals prisoners, as good as you. But granting that, I have destroyed you without great honour, as my troops fought with yours a whole day!"

After a little boasting on the part of Napoleon, which we pass, he entered on his late disastrous campaigns; and ended by saying—

"Your old fox, Kutusof, deceived me by his march on our flanks."

He carried his playful humour so far, that Poltorasky now and then disputed with him, and said, among other things, that the French had burned Moscow. The expression seemed unpleasant to Napoleon, who answered—

"What! the French? that act of barbarism was the work of your Russians."

"When you took possession of Moscow, and when all order was at end, it may be said that both the French and the Russians burned it; but I must frankly tell you, the Russians, so far from regretting the catastrophe, reflect with pride on the burning of their ancient capital, and can soon build another."

Napoleon continued to grow warmer. "It was a barbarous deed, and a stain on the nation. I took Berlin, Madrid, and Vienna, and no such thing happened."

"The Russians don't regret it, and are delighted with the results." Napoleon stamped with his foot, and ordered the prisoner to leave the room.

But the Emperor recovered his temper, sent Flahaut after the Russian prisoner, and loaded him with compliments; and again began a train of interrogatories, to all of which Poltorasky had but one answer—"I don't know." Thus baffled, Napoleon said—"Why does your Emperor not everywhere employ his own excellent troops, and not the Germans, whom I could annihilate in half an hour; while I have been fighting with you for a whole day."

"You ask me about the position of our army—that is a secret. To us the will of the Emperor is sacred, send us where he may."

"A gallant soldier says everything that comes uppermost."

"Our oath to our Emperor forbids that."

Here Napoleon, displaying an intercepted order from Blucher to Olsooffef, desiring him on no account to retire from Champaubert, exclaimed—"Here is your drunkard Blucher! Did he know I was here? Where I am there are a hundred thousand more." The Russian was proof against all Napoleon's arts, the uniform answer being, "I don't know."

In this campaign the Russian Emperor is everything; and Prussians, English, and Austrians, sink into insignificance. The Parisians come forth to meet the Emperor with enthusiasm—"Here he is! Here is Alexander! How graciously he nods to us! With what kindness he speaks to us!"

The French, who had pictured to themselves the Russians worn out by long campaigns and hard fighting; as speaking a language altogether unknown to them, and dressed in a wild outlandish fashion, could scarce believe their eyes, when they saw the smart Russian uniforms, the glittering arms, the joyous expression of the men, their healthy countenances, and the kind deportment of the officers. The smart repartees of the latter in the French language completed their astonishment. "You are not Russians," said they to us, "you are surely emigrants." The report of the incredible accomplishments of the conquerors flew from mouth to mouth. The praises of the Russians knew no bounds; the women from the windows and balconies welcomed us, by waving their handkerchiefs; and from one end of Paris [to the other?] the cry of "Long live Alexander! Long live the Russians!" was uttered by a million voices. "Reign over us," said they, "or give us a monarch like yourself."

The ecstasy of the Parisians did not stop here, nor yet the glorification of the Russian Emperor. We never hear a word all the while of Lord Castlereagh, save to learn how the Emperor snubbed the British Plenipotentiary; and there seems to have been no such man then known as an Arthur Wellesley. This is all as it should be. Easter Sunday was the especial day of the Emperor's glory. Accompanied by many foreigners, among whom were French marshals and generals, the Emperor publicly performed his devotions on the Place Louis XV. where an altar was erected on the spot where Louis XVI. had been beheaded; and there the Emperor knelt down. "This was truly the day of the triumph of Alexander's piety. Both in ancient and modern times, have kingdoms been conquered, but never before was seen an example of a conqueror, in the midst of a foreign capital, naming himself the mere instrument of Providence, and giving the glory of his success to God. When prayers were over, the roar of the Russian cannon resounded throughout Paris." This Russian writer forgets that Suwaroff gave glory to God for the sack of Ismail, and for every other bloody atrocity that he committed. The Russians are all pious; and what a Charlatan was this Alexander. In England he tricked the saints, and even mystified the Quakers. From the narrative of his aid-de-camp, one might imagine that it was solely by his clemency that France was not treated like Poland, and Paris like Ismail and Warsaw. On the same day the pious Emperor decorated his old coxcomical tutor, La Harpe, with the ribbon of St Andrew, and Madame, surrounded by a large party, burst into tears! The Russian General proceeds very characteristically. "The newspapers were at this time almost exclusively filled with articles about the Emperor Alexander; indeed it seemed as if Paris had ceased to think of the other allies. The French, whose most celebrated writers had been preaching infidelity for a whole century, were much astonished to observe the piety of the Emperor and the Russians." They were all, like their religious Emperor, mere instruments in the hand of Providence; and a medal was worn by the soldiers as a reward of merit, with the eye of Providence on one side, and on the other—"Not unto us, not unto us, but unto Thy name!" The magnanimity and piety of the Emperor was the burden of every journal, and the theatres rung nightly with "Long live the Russians!"

What pity that they were ever obliged to go away,

The English translator excuses himself from attempting the translation of some of the panegyrics and laudatory addresses pronounced by the Savans of Paris. Their "fustian phrases" could not be rendered into plain honest English. The vernacular speech wont bear such fulsome stuff, though we have seen the English language pretty hard tried of late in the same sort of service.

Haydon on Academies of Art.

Mr Haydon has been at war with that great self-elected corporation, the Royal Academy, for nearly thirty years, and yet the ardour of his hostility has not abated one jot. To the principle of nursery hot-beds, forcing houses for Art, he is decidedly opposed, and consequently, to Academies wheresoever found; but he has also a pet prejudice, a peculiar antipathy, a burning indignation, against that institution which, he argues, debases and crushes art in Britain, and which he has found personally injurious. Haslitt has argued the same question on broader grounds, and unbiased by personal irritation, and arrived at the same conclusion. Genius in art has uniformly risen to its greatest splendour before it was trammelled and suffocated by academies; and art has everywhere languished and decayed where the incorporated body has come to press like an incubus upon its native energies. Mr Haydon, as we think, is so thoroughly sound in the fundamental principle, that it is not worth while to cavil at the sweeping extent of some of his minute deductions. For the exceptions it matters little, while he can establish the rule,—and demonstrate the fact that

All over Europe, self-election, non-responsibility, exclusive monopoly, and state honours (in art) have had the same effect; all over Europe, men of the greatest talents and consequence have been destroyed, while men of moderate abilities, because they were members of such bodies, have lived in affluence and employment.

On this ground it was, that I commenced war with all academies which extend beyond the ordinary school, in other matters of education; and have not, I appeal to you, the disclosures before the committee of art justified hostilities?

It has taken twenty-six years to accomplish this desideratum, and it will take as long again, till the full intent of the principle of opposition can be reasonably worked to a conclusion: the country is advancing rapidly to enter into this question; and schools of design, which ought always to be the first step, are superseding exhibitions, which ought to be the last.

As the nobility get enlightened by lectures on art, and the people increase in knowledge and tact, do you think the fire will go out, when this generation has passed away? Indeed it will not. A race is gradually preparing itself, and will be doing it, whilst apparently the art may sink or stand still; and by and by some genius will arise, greater than any in our own times, who will carry the budding principles now alive to their full intensity and power. The time will come when Britain will shake off the local obstructions of the reformation, and its genius shine out on Europe, cleared of the superstitions of the Papists, of the idolatry of the Greeks; retaining the beauties of both without the absurdities of either, and carrying art on, on sounder moral principles than it has ever yet shewn itself to the world.

Every man will join in this prayer.

Mr Haydon has dilated upon the enormities of the Royal Academy from its birth-day. Its mean jealousies and paltry intrigues are certainly sufficiently contemptible, yet it is hard thus to visit the iniquities of the fathers upon the children. Their vehement denouncer will say, that it is a righteous punishment, as the innate wickedness of the parent-head is displayed with equal virulence in the present generation. He therefore testifies against academiclans of every generation, like an old Covenanter; anathematizes, excommunicates them, for forcing Reynolds to resign, expelling Barry, and ill-using "Wilkie, Martin, Lough," and why not Haydon? He accuses them—

1. Because it is their acknowledged principle that the art is a thing they have a right to keep to themselves!*

2. From their opposing the advance of artists, by denying them the just privileges which other bodies grant.

3. I accuse them of not only wishing to keep back the nation, but of the selfish desire to mislead their taste, by sanctioning the publication of the infamous Catalogue Raisonné, in which all the greatest names were abused; and by which the liberal patrons were disgusted.

4. I accuse them of hating distinguished talent, by forcing Reynolds to resign, expelling Barry, and degrading Wilkie and Martin.

5. Of detesting high art, and of a mean fear of its ultimate triumph, by chilling the Government, and never as a body having come forward to influence the Government to assist it.

6. By their always giving portraits the best situations in their annual show, and never prominently bestowing rank on historical pictures by good places, unless till forced by shame and reproaches.

These are grave accusations—but now to another proof.

"And lastly, their interference in the School of Design for the mechanic, to prevent his knowing the figure—such a winding up of selfishness as would scarcely ever have been imagined but by myself."

Art was at the lowest ebb about 1805, when Wilkie appeared in London, and redeemed its disgrace. Mr Haydon assigns the rapid advance of art since that time to the perfection of Wilkie's early productions. This may be going a little too far. The long interval he specifies, has been one of rapid advancement in many things, and from a variety of causes. It is more to the point, that Wilkie was the fostered pupil of no academy. He had merely studied at Graham's school in this city, and went from Edinburgh to London "a finished painter."

It would appear that the Royal Academy now elect their Presidents upon the principle, that the want of genius is to be held a recommendation! The manner in which certain affairs are managed in England, and indeed everywhere else, is neatly told in the following passage. The academicians had, according to Mr Haydon, contrived to appropriate to themselves all the substantial benefits of the parliamentary vote for the National Gallery, and by their management, for we must not say intrigues, thus frustrated the public objects of that vote. In vain, Mr Haydon used his eloquence with Lord Grey and the other members of the Government, and told them facts which he was likely to understand fully as well as they. He predicted to them, he says, what has come to pass.—But we meant to shew the pointed style in which Mr Haydon describes the mode by which the Academy accomplished its object in establishing a new monopoly:—

Why did Mr Spring Rice carry the Academy under his paternal wings, "as a hen gathereth her chickens?" Why?—the old curse. The President† had successfully painted him, I believe! Was it for this he swore to carry their body, limbs, and head, through all the doors of the building? Was it for this he embarrassed the art of England for another fifty years—and staggered their taste? I, without rank, without fortune, without property, however undisputable my arguments, however self-evident my warnings—whatever were my talents, humble or powerful—I was no match for a first lord, against a Chancellor of the Exchequer and a president who had successfully painted him. The good I did one day, was overturned the next; and on my saying, "The president dines with the Chancellor of the Exchequer, and they go and persuade Lord Grey." "That's the way it's done," said Yes, that's the way it was done.

* From Northcote.—B. R. H.

† Sir Martin Shee.

Mr Haydon justly complains of the public being still excluded from those places, which their money has erected, and he proves from late instances, with what perfect safety to the objects of art in the gallery, this liberty or right may be granted:—

"Let in the coal-heaver—the pretty servant girl—the industrious mechanic—to give these wretches a taste for art! Abominable!" The Queen and Lord John were defied; and her Majesty and her Home Secretary bowed their heads in submission.

At Newcastle, the people were let in: nothing could exceed their proper behaviour; and what is more interesting, that historical subjects of the most interest and highest poetry, were the subjects about which the brutal coal-heaver and ignorant mechanic assembled in crowds. So much for the danger to works of art, if the people are treated like other human beings!

At the British Museum, 28,000 people passed in, in one day; and since Hampton Court and the Cartoons have been thrown open, 58,000 have been let in; and what injury has accrued to these sublime and fragile productions? "All this is very true," say the academicians; "but what loss would accrue to art, if the back of the Theseus or the dying Ananias were annihilated by the vulgar touchings of the mob: do you put these productions in comparison with the shine of his Majesty's boot by Sir Martin? Profanation!"

The Government say they do not mean to use force. But I say they ought: they had no such delicacy for Gaton or Old Sarum; and here is a borough for schedule A, more rotten, selfish, and corrupt in art than the dirtiest mud in Old Sarum's ditch.

Safely entrenched in their new castle, and the public grown sick of the subject, the Academicians, according to Mr Haydon, defy the Radicals in art. The Whig Government has become Conservative in art as in politics, and portrait-painting being now the chief object patronised, "high art, and sound taste, and schools of design," are voted the radicalism of art, and ought to be discountenanced and put down. According to Mr Haydon, the Royal Academy carries the horror of innovation to a prodigious height:—

To draw the skeleton, and master the muscles before you paint, is to render yourself suspected of being a republican; but nothing can be more loyal, nothing more orthodox, than to paint without knowing the one or the other. When you see a hand painted as it ought to be, avoid the monster who painted it, he is concerned in a conspiracy to overthrow the throne and the altar! Mr Haydon admits that he may be accused of anger, and suspected of the probability of being less opposed to those abuses had he profited by them. He hopes that his virtue would have been found proof, but even his fall would not have altered the facts; nor yet the circumstance that some who once were like him Reformers, are now vociferous R. A.'s. Mr Haydon vindicates his indignation by potent argument and clinching facts:—

Luther was angry, Knox was angry, Wickliffe was angry; but their anger and their discontent produced your present happiness, and past freedom and independence of conscience! Did my just discontent make the Academy spend £19,750 on dinners, and but £4,688 in sending students abroad in seventy years?

LORD BROUGHAM'S PAMPHLETS.

These pamphlets will be in every one's hands before we have had time to notice them. That on National Education, in the form of a letter to the Duke of Bedford, was probably written to correct the misapprehension—the pretended misapprehension we verily believe—of his Lordship's speech at the close of the Session, when, in sorrow, he surrendered his bill to the discretion and mercy of Lord Melbourne. The argumentative part of the Letter is nearly a recapitulation of what Lord Brougham has been saying on the same topic in the last and former sessions; but, feeling this cause deeply and keenly, a glowing and vehement eloquence distinguishes the composition which is remarkable even among those of its author. Unless his Lordship, heading the friends of Education, shall now come forward like a primitive apostle, and go about from town to town planting voluntary schools—which, if not on the most stable foundation, will be better than none at all—we see nothing more that can be done. From the Whigs nothing is to be expected save a dribble of an annual or occasional grant, to be, in a 'great measure, jobbed for patronage. It is as little to be hoped that Lord Brougham will take the course which we have indicated, half in sport. We must, therefore, rest patient with the impulse given, and to which his voice and pen have powerfully contributed, until, in some happy distant time, the country, become stronger in the popular principle—more Democratic, in plain terms—may find a Government strong enough to carry a scheme of National Education which shall really deserve the name. Meanwhile, we do not despair of the cause of Education, small as is our hope from either Whigs or Tories. The physical improvement of the condition of the people, by the abolition of the Food-Taxes and the restrictions on trade, will powerfully tend to promote popular education. Children must have sufficient food and clothes before they can be well taught. The cheap postage, which removes the trammels from mind as well as commerce, will hold out a liberal bounty on elementary education, and promote knowledge and improvement in a degree very imperfectly understood; and, as to our successive aristocratic Governments, the people must have farther instructed them before they are either capable or willing to educate the People.

DR LANG AND MR POLACK OF NEW ZEALAND.

A LONG letter has been addressed to us, by Mr Polack, complaining of the misrepresentations and calumnies of Dr Lang, regarding himself and the Missionaries, in the Letter lately addressed by the Reverend Doctor to the Earl of Durham, as Governor of the New-Zealand Land Company. This letter we reviewed, and extracted some of the passages offensive to Mr Polack. Our natural idea, on receiving Mr Polack's letter, was, if Dr Lang has really traduced and belied Mr Polack and the missionaries, (who have somehow acquired very large estates in New Zealand,) why do they not promptly confute him? We were not without a previous idea that our reverend countryman might not be the meekest of ministers, nor even the most charitable of Christians; but newly planted Colonies are not to be watered with rose-water; and the unquiet Doctor's qualities may be those most useful to a young and not altogether immaculate community, however ungraceful to the pastoral office and character. No one can have read his books without obtaining a notion that Dr Lang, partly from principle, and perhaps a good deal from temper, was a true son of the church militant; but he has had much rough pioneer work to perform, which is not to be got through without giving offence. We need not here advert to "Mr Polack the Jew's" very unfavourable opinion of "Dr Lang the Christian;" which opinion, according to Mr Polack, is entertained by the whole Colony, where the Presbyterian Minister would seem to be a kind of pious or political Ishmaelite, with his hand against every man and every man's hand against him. Moreover, we still consider the Reverend gentleman right in principle in the Letter which he has addressed to Lord Durham; but he seems far wrong in details; and he has, if not invented, adopted facts injurious to the character of Mr Polack and others, which, having extracted, we now feel bound in justice to contradict. After all, some may say we are only opposing Mr Polack's statements to Dr Lang's. The former gentleman ought, however, to be best acquainted with the facts of his own case; and he assures us, in substance, that instead of "the princely estate" in New Zealand, with which Dr Lang, by a malicious stroke of his pen, has endowed him, "the utmost extent of all his purchases does not exceed 1100 acres; and, for this, instead of buying it for a trifle, and perhaps cheating the natives in the payment," as Dr Lang alleges, he has paid for part at the rate of "£6:10s. an acre to the native chiefs, the proprietors of the soil." We are not going to moot the question of who are the proprietors of the soil; and we acknowledge that 1100 acres do not look very enormous as matters go in the colonies. That he has not cheated the natives in the payment Mr Polack solemnly avers. He possesses, he says, a document to which is affixed the mark, postmark, or signature of a certain George Mair, once the carpenter of a whaler, and afterwards a servant of the missionaries, authenticating the due payment of his lands. Now this said George Mair, (a Peterhead man,) having left his benefactors the missionaries, who taught him to read and write, is affirmed to be Dr Lang's principal if not sole authority for the calumnies contained in his Letter. Mr Polack alludes to another document in his possession which, as he thinks, establishes his own integrity in his transactions with the natives. It is a letter addressed to him by the Rev. Mr Williams, chairman of the Missionary Society, cautioning him to be careful as to what he gave for the acre of land, as his price would form a rule, and regulate the general price. But this does not much affect the question. It is more to the point, and, as we conceive, only the fulfilment of a duty, to cite the following passage from Mr Polack's letter, which we are sorry we cannot conveniently publish at greater length. We entirely omit his abuse of Dr Lang, to which the reverend gentleman has perhaps laid himself open:—

"As to myself, I only observe, DECIDEDLY and ENERGETICALLY, that now and hereafter, I challenge from any appointed authority the STRICTEST SCRUTINY as to the mode by which I acquired my 'princely estate' in New Zealand; the EQUITY of the value I GAVE for the said estate, at the time, to the absolute proprietors; and of the ENTIRE EQUITY OF THOSE PURCHASES I MADE."

This is enough as regards Mr Polack individually; and there we leave the matter to those who have interest in it, or inclination to sift it farther. Mr Polack cannot seriously imagine that we consider his conscientiously holding the faith of his fathers, any disparagement whatever; nor yet that we are likely to participate in Dr Lang's colonial or sectarian spleens and jealousies. We could wish that the state of colonial society, and his own temperament, allowed the Rev. Doctor to be a little more courteous and forbearing with all his brethren, whether Jews or Christians, publicans or sinners; but, in New South Wales, Dr Lang, whether as the rough exposé of iniquities in systems, or individuals, has been of great use. Had he been able to accomplish his task with more meekness of wisdom, it might certainly have been desirable both for his own sake and that of the religion of which he is a minister.

TAIT'S EDINBURGH MAGAZINE.

DECEMBER, 1839.

MEMOIRS OF HARRIOT, DUCHESS OF ST ALBANS.

THE world would seem, according to Mrs Baron-Wilson, the biographer of the Duchess, to have been, for nearly half a century, under the most grievous mistake about the true character of Miss Mellon and Mrs Coutts, whether as protegee, wife, or widow. Persons piquing themselves upon their morals, as well as the censorious and malicious, have united to do the Duchess of St Albans grievous wrong. Indeed, the more liberal and indulgent portion of the public—those who accepted of her invitations, or her gifts and her patronage—have been equally wrong. They have rarely done more than set down the enterprising adventuress of the stage—the bold, buxom, and ambitious widow—at her true value, as a shrewd, clever, and amusingly audacious personage; systematically and successfully elbowing her way to notoriety, while she aimed at distinction; and, possessed of some good points of character, though, farther than appearances went, not troubled with scruples of any sort; and, if politically studious of certain flimsy proprieties, quite untroubled with the ordinary feminine delicacies, or the misgivings of a modest nature. But this is all mistake. Instead of the character to which natural disposition, and her training from infancy as a strolling actress, cursed with a violent, vulgar, coarse-minded, loving, and scheming mother, must, in the ordinary course of experience, have formed her, Mrs Baron-Wilson's heroine comes forth a perfect paragon of the nobler virtues. The notions, in particular, which the evil-minded world formed of the long and intimate connexion of the sprightly and ambitious actress with old Mr Coutts, the millionaire, are not only untrue, but the very reverse of truth; for, if she had been foolish and naughty, and not followed the ruled precedent of Miss Farren with the Earl of Derby, and set the example for that other precedent to stage heroines, the engagement of “the much esteemed Miss Stephens” with the married Earl of Essex—if, in short, the platonic of old Coutts and Miss Mellon had not been a real bona fide platonic, then had Mrs Baron-Wilson never condescended to write this biography. Nay, there were new features in this singular tie. Mr Coutts, though he had a living wife, in a condition to call forth all the tenderness and respect of a husband, and three nobly-married daughters with large families, the children of the wife of his youth, had become paternally attached to his “blessed Harriot,” as he fondly terms Miss Mellon; who again, from the extreme warmth and devotion of her filial feelings, so far surpassing those of his real daughters, was sometimes taken for his child! Even Lady Burdett, and the Ladies Bute and Guildford, it is here stated, imagined their doting papa's new favourite their sister! Had they really chosen to affect preferring their old father as an unfaithful husband, rather than a superannuated dotard, infatuated by an artful, complacent, and not very scrupulous woman, the countenance which they are said to have given her—the cordial, social habits in which they lived with her at the early period of her connexion with Mr Coutts—is not among the noblest features of what is imagined the aristocratic character. We are not going to be in the least uncharitable towards Miss Mellon. In captivating the affections of the millionaire, and riveting his chains by every art and wile, and, above all, by the impudent hypocrisy of unbounded personal affection and exclusive devotion, she was only labouring in her vocation; but we have much less indulgence for the ladies who, if this history be correct, stooped to maintain some influence over their father's mind, and some hold over his purse, through so degrading a medium as his “blessed Harriot.”

The fair biographer sets out by assuring her readers that, to those who were in habits of close intimacy with the Duchess, any vindication of her character must be superfluous. With this we entirely agree; but we are farther informed, “that, as the breath of malignity has endeavoured to taint her fame, it is a duty which the author owes to her memory, as well as one which she owes to herself, to set before the reader a true account of the chief incident of her life." This chief incident is "the patronage" of Mr Coutts; and Mrs Baron-Wilson is astonished that a wicked and censorious world can see any harm in a connexion so natural and harmless as an old married man falling into a violent platonic or fatherly regard for a sprightly actress of twenty-eight, who perfectly adored him living, and worshipped him dead! who was his consoling angel—his ministering spirit—his solace against the indifferent or ungrateful daughters who sought to slight his "blessed Harriot," after she had legally obtained their mother's place. If there should be any remaining doubt about the immaculate nature of the early connexion, as there can be none whatever about the policy and prudence of the young lady, it is set to rest by the following facts and testimonials to character:—When, after the death of Mr Coutts, his managing widow was found to have the sole power of his enormous wealth, there was a very general burst of public indignation, at the gross injustice of the old man, whom dotage alone could excuse, and which, naturally, fell upon the mournful relief. The "profligate press" malignantly assailed "her fair fame;" and the lady, rich enough to be the bride of Mammon, but sadly in want of a few scraps of character, determined to prosecute the slanderers. She retained Mr Brougham and Sir James Scarlett, who were directed to consult with her friends, the Marquis of Bristol, the Earl of Lauderdale, and others, and to examine certain documents on which she rested her vindication. Those documents consisted of many friendly and cordial notes from Mr Coutts' daughters, shewing on what familiar and intimate terms they and their female children, had lived with their papa's "blessed Harriot;" and some letters from Mr Coutts himself to Miss Mellon. The preliminary court of honour, consisting of the noblemen we have named, rather shied the idea of the Court of King's Bench; but nevertheless pronounced an opinion to the effect that they had never entertained a doubt of the blameless nature of the patronage of Mr Coutts, or the strict propriety of Miss Mellon's conduct. This was no doubt highly satisfactory; and the prosecution was dropped. It is unfortunate that the author is not in a condition to lay even one of these documents before her readers; so that, instead of forming their opinion on the alleged Lauderdale report, they might form their own judgment. We are sorry to find that the author's materials for compiling the memoirs, are of the most general and flimsy sort: nor does she seem to possess one original letter. Old Coutts' epistles, we are led to conclude, would shew him a very different person from what the world imagines; full of romance and high-flown sentiment, and with such feelings! Yet we cannot perceive that the author has even seen one of them. The familiar letters of Lady Burdett, the Countess of Guildford, and the Marchioness of Bute, to their father's consoling angel, must also be great curiosities—that is, if they now exist at all. These documents

Consisted of a great quantity of letters from the daughters of Mr Coutts to Miss Mellon, during many years, up to the time of her marriage; all couched in the most affectionate terms, making daily appointments for accompanying their father to Miss Mellon's house, or meeting him there; giving frequent details of their mother's health, or forming arrangements for bringing parties of their friends to Miss Mellon's villa at Highgate: all shewing, by their playful allusions, an almost sisterly intercourse between her and those admirably conducted persons. At that time they were all married to men of high rank, who likewise visited Miss Mellon, and received her among their youthful families.

In one of Miss Mellon's chambers there were four little white cribs set apart for the four daughters of Sir Francis Burdett. Where, indeed, could so fair an example of the union of virtues and graces have been found, for the improvement of young female children, as in the dwelling of Mrs Cornwell Baron-Wilson's paragon and Mr Coutts' protégée.

Having, in a general way, stated the claims of the virtues of the Duchess of St Albans upon her commemorative pen, Mrs Baron-Wilson enumerates and dwells upon each in a formal preliminary eulogy. And, first of the first, though, we fear, Hannah More and the then Bishop of London never guessed as much, "RELIGION was the most remarkable and striking quality of her mind." This foundation-virtue is elaborately made out to have been at all times a characteristic of Mrs Coutts. A cardinal virtue, eminently possessed and exercised by the Duchess, was CHARITY, in the sense of giving money—and a very good kind of charity it is. A third was GENEROSITY, (these leading virtues are all printed in epitaph characters in the original work,) and this was not merely generosity in giving, but in thought and conduct—as, for example, in bestowing large sums upon her husband's family, though she possessed letters from the imbecile old father,

In which he has commanded her, under pain of his displeasure, not to plead to him in the cause of his family, who (in his opinion) had spoken and acted unkindly respecting her, after the marriage; and conjuring his "blessed Harriot," by very forcible terms, not to share with them any part of the wealth after his decease which would be the cause of animosity towards her. Yet she had the generosity to persevere in pleading their cause, until she procured his forgiveness for the parties.

The forgiveness of the parties—but not any alteration of his testamentary dispositions: Mr Coutts claimed the right to do what he would with his own; and his whole fortune was but too little to mark his sense of what he owed to the endearments and affection of his "blessed Harriot." The other qualities for which the Duchess was remarkable, were cheerfulness, which never failed, and wit. She was also amiably considerate for those about her. Though not exactly celebrated for TRUTHFULNESS—a quality scarcely compatible with the proper management, for a dozen years, of a rich old gentleman who had his will to make—"a strong principle of truth pervaded the Duchess' conduct, and implicit reliance might be placed on her word:"—including, we may fairly presume, her enthusiastic professions of attachment to old Coutts, living and dead, and her avowed extreme dislike of everything savouring of vanity, show, and ostentation; her genuine humility, and unobtrusive piety. Her "friendship" for Mr Coutts was the leading incident in her life; and, as Mrs Baron-Wilson justly remarks, "There can no friendship be permanent which is not based on similitude of religious feelings between the parties; and it is a valuable fact, that all her favourite friends, and both her husbands, were known to be remarkable for their devotional feelings." Happy Mrs Coutts, and thrice happy Duchess of St Albans. Her mother was a religious character also, and early imbued her daughter's mind with the piety of eating pancakes at Shrove-tide, and goose at Michaelmas; while she watched as rigidly over her morals as ever did Mrs Peachum over those of poor Polly,—seemingly determined that she should never throw herself away on less than a lord or a rich old banker. "The actress's mother" is the gem of the work; the only piece of genuine truth and real life about it: we shall not lose sight of her, especially as Harriot, with a better natural understanding, and a much better education, was, in all points affecting her interests and destinies, quite mamma's own scheming daughter.

Though we demur to the unmeasured measure of the higher virtues which it has pleased Mrs Baron-Wilson to attribute to her gorgeous heroine, we do not mean to affect any extraordinary rigidity in judging of the moral character and conduct of a woman who, born and trained as we have noticed, in the most exposed condition in which a female can be placed, schemed to become the most prominent instance of the mean and sordid influences over the aristocratic, which modern times have afforded. We may have ten times more sympathy, and morally, if not prudentially, speaking, ten times more respect for many a frail and unfortunate member of the histrionic sisterhood, who has perished in shame and misery, than for the cool, wary, and prudent Miss Mellon—who, by the time she came to inveigle or cajole old Coutts, no longer, we apprehend, required the aid and tutelage of her watchful mother—than for the illustrious Duchess of St Albans; and this without slighting any one of her good points. There was a hearty audacity about her, a thinly veiled hypocrisy, a cool, unconscious, well-tempered, easy effrontery, which must have been really diverting; and a merry and frank humour, and apparent good-heartedness, which were even amiable.

Mrs Coutts is chiefly precious to the observer and the moralist, as a test of the omnipotence of Mammon in England in the nineteenth century. She was, at the worst, less base herself than the cause of bringing into light the latent baseness and poverty of spirit of those around her. What curious combinations of the insolent and the mean, the temporizing and the contemptuous, it must have been the fortune of the poor stroller, become the full-blown Widow Coutts, surrounded by a cortège of proud English nobility, to witness and to enjoy. A little adroit flattery, with fair interest and good security, might have sufficed from princes of the royal blood to the worldly banker; but his magnificent relict, the blazoned impersonation of scrip and omnium, exacted deeper homage. Her worshippers must perform their "ducking observance" in the face of day, and in the eye of Fashion. How this shrewd insolent woman—in her spirit ever impudent, whatever gloze her manners wore—must have been tickled with the performance of the part her merry nature assigned to her high-born companions! On them she took ample revenge for all the humiliations she had endured in her Couttonian bondage. Dr Johnson relates, as a fine trait in a gentleman living at Inverary Castle, that, when the Duke of Argyle rather unceremoniously ordered him to fetch something from another room, he obeyed, but whistled as he went, to shew his independence and social equality. The led noblemen, and young women of quality, bound to perform the hests of the Widow Coutts, durst not whistle.

The difference between the spirit of the age of bronze and bank paper, of chivalry and cotton-rags, was never more strikingly displayed than in the instance of the Widow Coutts. The cruel Saccharissas, and beautiful Parthenias, of past generations, presumed to be insolent, capricious, and haughty, in right of their indomitable and all-conquering charms, and to treat their lovers as Johnson said of his Widow Porter, with whom, however, he belled-the-cat "like dogs." But the well-endowed ladies of the Age of Gold, which is the direct antipodes of the Golden age, sometimes treat their noble suitors like turnspit curs.

The Widow Coutts, "buxom, blithe, and debonnaire" as she was, and always affected to be, must, however, have digested a competent share of chagrin and bitter mortification in her time. There were proud and high-minded members of the aristocracy, the gentry, and even of the commonalty, who would not fall down and worship Mammon in the newly painted and bedizened female image, and though disguised in the garb of Fashion. Whatever Mrs Baron-Wilson may believe, many besides the "profligate" portion of the London press, which attacked Mrs Coutts with an eye to her purse, despised the bustling and vulgar, vain and obtrusive dame, whom brassy honours and golden treasures, meanly acquired, only rendered more despicable in the estimation of the high-minded.

The long-suffering endurance and humiliations, by which this naturally passionate and violent woman acquired great notoriety and unbounded wealth, were never repaid to her in this life. Let every vain young actress, on or off the stage, similarly tempted, ponder her history. Miss Mellon herself was not without warning. The brilliant fortune of Miss Farren might have been understood by her at its true value, had she desired to profit by the lesson. It was probably the happiest period of her own life, when, having procured an engagement at Drury Lane, she became popular with the manager and the company, by her cheerful good humour, and readiness to oblige. Nor were her indifferent talents for the stage of a kind to awaken rivalry. Miss Mellon, always prudent, never walked the high ropes, like the greater heroines. Her climbing was by creeping. About this time Miss Farren had disgusted the public by her airs and defiance of Kemble the manager, but had been compelled to give way, and to appear in a despised satin dress, which had been the mighty cause of the feud.

Miss Mellon being then just introduced to the principal green room, (through the amiability of Mrs Siddons,) very wisely thought it better to listen to the conversational style of the grand actresses, than to indulge her own bavarderie; and a great penance this silence must have been to her. Accordingly, when Lord Derby and other theatrical noblemen would assemble round Miss Farren, Miss Mellon used to stand near this glass of fashion. The great lady was very partial to the rustic belle, and, doubtless, she derived much professional benefit from her intercourse with the most elegant actress on the stage, whose refined readings of Lady Teazle, and the more elevated class of comedy, are to this day quoted as beyond attainment. Lord Derby was a very singular looking little man for a lover. Although at this time but forty-five, he looked fifteen years older. He had an excessively large head, surmounting his small spare figure, and wore his hair tied in a long thin pig-tail. This, with his attachment to short nankeen gaiters, made him an easily-recognized subject in the numerous caricatures of the day.

Miss Mellon was one evening standing near the green-room fire, and, while waiting for the play to begin, she was humming some popular dance, and just tracing the steps unconsciously. She was roused by the voice of Miss Farren, whispering, "You happy girl, I would give worlds to be like you!"

Poor Miss Mellon, recollecting her thirty shilling salary, thought she was ridiculed by "a lady with thirty guineas a week, who was to marry a lord;" and she replied, with some slight vexation, that "there certainly must be a vast deal to be envied in her position, by one who commanded what she pleased!"

Pressing her hand kindly, Miss Farren's eyes became full of tears as she replied, "I cannot command such a light heart as prompted your little song!"

If, instead of the rank fudge into which the author of this memoir has been betrayed, in attempting the apotheosis of her RELIGIOUS, CHARITABLE, GENEROUS heroine—who lived the life of the most amiable and virtuous of women, and died in the odour of sanctity—she had simply contended that Mrs Coutts was no worse in any respect than the majority of her compeers would have been, if placed in her position, while few of them would have displayed her genial qualities, we should cordially have gone along with her; and have considered, which we still do, the poor base-born girl, who, by dexterity, became the richest woman, and one of the highest-titled dames of England, a much nobler creature than hundreds of the lordly things that swelled her train or bowed at her footstool. But, to make an angel and a saint of her! The world will stand nothing so incongruous.

It can hardly longer endure "Fair Rosamond," or Bulwer's "La Valliere." Let us think no more of this, but take the clever, intriguing, and ambitious woman as she is. In her genuine chaacter, she will afford both entertainment and instruction.

Like some other great adventurers, whom the Christian public styles "fortunate," the origin of the enormously wealthy Widow Coutts—"ten pawnbroker's widows rolled into one"—was doubtful. Miss Mellon had a mother—a genuine "actress's mother"—often a much worse character than the actress herself; but, as to her father, history is either dumb or contradictory; and the parentage of the Most Noble the Duchess of St Albans, like that of some other goddesses must ever remain wrapped up in mystery. The mother was the handsome daughter of a peasant near Cork, who, when her parents died, became helper, or woman-of-all-work, to a little shop-keeper or milliner, where she acquired those accomplishments of scouring rusty silks, and dying gauzes and feathers, which, with a swift needle, rendered her, about the year 1775, invaluable to a strolling company of comedians. She had made "the tour of Wales" once, when the company was scattered, and she returned to Cork. Her illustrious daughter was the consequence of an amour with a gentleman who "lodged across the way." This person is described as "Lieutenant Mellon of the Madras Infantry, home on sick leave." He was never heard of more, though a rumour that a person of the name had died in the outward voyage did not prevent Miss Mellon's mother from electing a lord as her gallant, and boasting through life of the high blood in Harriot's veins. Extremes meet. The mother of the Duchess, who, though she could neither read nor write, acted with shrewdness and cunning, seems to have been, in half-mad violence and vulgarity, the exact counterpart of the far-descended heiress of Gight, Byron's unhappy mother, as she is described by the too faithful pen of Moore. In their treatment of their offspring, each displayed the same brutal ferocity, alternating with pride, tiger-like animal fondness. Such was the parentage of the illustrious Harriot. We look back with amazement to the times of jocund, good-natured Nelly Gwynne, one of the great-grandmothers of the Duke of St Albans. Our own times are as prolific of social wonders. Mrs Coutts was too shrewd to repeat her mother's ridiculous tales about her noble if illegitimate birth, without the saving clause of "My mother says so and so." This woman's dexterity, with her needle, and accomplishments in dressing up old silks and gauzes made her so valuable to the strollers, that she made a second excursion into England, where her daughter was born. Shortly afterwards she married a lad of eighteen, named Entwisle, the sole musician of the company. The Irishwoman was, at least, ten years older than her husband, whom she ruled with a rod of iron. This was about the year 1778, and Harriot was now a year old. But her real age is as problematical as her parentage. She was, as a child, "remarkably tall of her age."

The incidental glimpses of the strollers' wretched life, found in these volumes, is much more interesting than those sketches of the Duchess' doings which have been found recorded in Sunday newspapers and old play-bills. The Entwisle family was notorious for rows, the wife claiming to keep the purse, and the young husband being a person of vicious habits and low tastes, exposed to great temptation by his vagrant profession. Though fond of his little step-daughter, he was unable to comprehend the grand projects of her scheming Irish mother, who was thus early calculating upon the advantages which were to arise to her from the beauty and fascinations of her well-tutored daughter displayed on the London boards! Entwisle did not grudge that part of his earnings—over which, however, he had no control—should be expended on the child's education, of which the expense was not great.

At first, while they were too poor to hire any conveyance during their tours, Mr and Mrs Entwisle used to carry Harriot and his celebrated Cremona violin alternately; and afterwards, when their means were increased so as to allow of payment for one of the group to be conveyed from one town to another, it was always Harriot who was thus sent, and wrapped up in some rather finer habiliments than the pedestrian pair.

Mr Entwisle, in the first year of their marriage, being obliged to seek another engagement, it was considered that Lancashire, his native county, would afford the best prospect. Accordingly, having packed up his famous Cremona, they set out, carrying Harriot alternately; and near Preston they encountered the Lancashire strolling manager, Bibby, who being then in want of a musician, was very glad to engage so excellent a performer. . . . Notwithstanding their slender means, however, Mrs Entwisle devoted a portion of them to sending her little Harriot to a day-school.

The child is mother to the woman. Little Harriot, fond of frolic and play, and idle at her book, Used to relate, her custom was to enter the school room with a face of importance, as though conscious of being well prepared with her learning; and then, after making a knot of little creatures giggle by her nonsense, she would creep behind the open door, where, reading her lesson, she could defy the world and its cares.

Miss Mellon, we imagine, knew, through life, when to assume the face of importance. She was full of fun and childish mischief, yet, according to her own account, a great favourite with her schoolmistress. One of her early repartees, if genuine, shews blood:—

Miss Calvert one day endeavouring to check the invincible love of chattering which was inherent in her pupil, said—"O Harriot! does your tongue never lie?" And her companion, who knew thoroughly she meant "lie quiet," slyly answered—"No, ma'am, it never lies: that is so naughty!"

She was already on the stage in parts fitted to her age, or required by the exigencies of the manager; and she could also recite and sing to her step-father's violin, and was initiated very early into stage-begging and other minor arts and mysteries of the craft.

Mr Entwisle used to carry her to different houses, to dance hornpipes to his playing; and after executing the dance on the same elevated stage, she used to run round its edge to levy contributions for her avaricious relatives.

She could already dance neatly, and sing glees; and, what is more remarkable, somehow acquired a "diction remarkable for purity," and deep knowledge of the erudite beauties of Shakspeare!

She never was blue in any shade, nor even a reader of romances; and she very early began to "bode the silk gown," of which she got not merely the proverbial sleeve, but the full and ample garment—"When I am a fine London player," was already her style. She was constantly performing all sorts of parts, and had a salary of something less than four and sixpence a-week. About this time, she saw at Harrogate, in her strolling excursions, Mrs Jordan, and some of the lesser London stars. The refusal of the manager to raise Harriot's salary above 4s. 6d., made the virago mother revolt; and the daughter and husband, after a period of starvation, found another engagement, where the musician's salary was one guinea weekly, and the daughter's was raised, by degrees, to fifteen shillings. Wherever they went, the mother was dresser, and found scope for her millinery and feather-dyeing genius. They were now in Stafford, in the troop of a Mr Stanton, who strolled in the midland counties, and was respectable in his private character. While hanging on, waiting for this engagement, the future Duchess made her first brilliant appearance in some small town, where no less than a Baronet and his Lady had commanded the "bespeak" of the Country Girl. The play was then in high fame from Mrs Jordan's Peggy—and Miss Mellon was to take the same part! One of the wandering Thespians had to walk as far as Leeds to procure a copy of the play! There were great difficulties about Peggy's dresses; but Mrs Entwisle was as pushing a mother as a young debutante could have desired; and neither daughter nor mother appears ever to have lacked anything they wished from false delicacy.

Half-past six arrived, and the one musician (Mr Entwisle) led off with "Rule Britannia," "Britons Strike Home," and "The Bonny Pitman," an air then, and perhaps now, a favourite in the north. Up went the curtain, and the play commenced. The house, or barn, was crowded to excess. The élite of the neighbourhood all attended—being more anxious to testify their respect to the baronet who patronized the performance, than their admiration of the dramatic company.

The play, hurriedly as it had been produced, went on capitally. The family whose "bespeak" had proved so attractive were in what, out of courtesy, must be termed the stage-box; and, at an early part of the evening, they singled out Miss Mellon (probably from her extreme youth and talent) as the principal object of their applause.

Those who look at plays through the medium of metropolitan performances, can scarcely conceive what a young aspiring actor or actress feels, when making their incipient steps in a place scarcely the size of a dining-room, where they can hear every murmur of applause or displeasure, and catch a glance of hope from the "Very well indeed" of a fashionable party on one side, or be depressed by the adverse "Oh, dear!" of another. . . . Miss Mellon sung between play and farce, (accompanied by the single fiddle,) and was encored; and finished her evening's exertions by performing Miss Biddy, in "Miss in her Teens." All succeeded capitally, so that the mother and daughter retired to rest, congratulating themselves on the result of the evening's entertainments.

The Duchess of St Albans never could have been so triumphant in the royal drawing-room, to which she pushed her way, as in this barn theatre. But the great family had discovered that some of Peggy's clothes had come from their own wardrobe. The Baronet was furious—his father's marriage-suit worn by Peggy as her boy-dress! The housekeeper was found the delinquent, and the eloquence of Mrs Entwisle and her daughter disarmed the resentment of the angry gentleman. The family came to Miss Mellon's benefit, and the lady gave her the first good frock she ever possessed. Her luck was begun.

On first coming to Stafford, the vagrant family had lodgings at only 2s. 6d. a-week; but Harriot was sent to learn writing and arithmetic, for which her step-father paid by lessons on the violin. She was thrown back in her parts, as there were several respectable performers in the company. "It is," says her biographer, known at Stafford, that her morning dress was too shabby for her to appear at the churches there, and her mother used to send her regularly to Ingestrie Church, (built by Lord Talbot, and adjoining his mansion,) because she was less liable there to incur remark on the poverty of her appearance.

The vale between Lord Talbot's estate and the town was a great gathering place for the children to play; and Harriot, whose love of amusement was unconquerable, used to steal out perpetually from her close room to this pretty spot, where she was unrivalled among the "young ladies" as a player at ball. Numbers of her playmates are now living, and well remember the disagreeable interruption which Mrs Entwisle would cause in her daughter's athletic amusements, by driving her home with heavy blows, (some of which occasionally fell on the associates,) and, amidst dreadful reproaches, the perpetual taunt that she was "a disgrace to the high blood in her veins."

The wondering children, who were all better dressed than the vagrant member of the aristocracy, used to torment poor Harriot dreadfully respecting the visionary grandeur. She bore it all in perfect good humour, if they would only play at ball with her; and their assemblies were delightful, until the light-footed Mrs Entwisle would slip in amongst them, and disperse the terrified mockers of high blood like chaff before the wind.

Miss Mellon had always "a winning way," and could joke and wheedle herself into favour from a very early age. She became a favourite in the manager's family, and was invited to join their little parties. There was then a much less strict line of demarcation between the town's people in provincial towns and the players than now exists. The ladies lent Miss Mellon stage-dresses; and every kindness and mark of attention was punctually and gratefully acknowledged. She was at no time careless of her good fortune, or of the smallest means of advancing it.

Giddy as she was, nothing could exceed her care of articles lent to her; if it were not too late, it is said, they were always returned on the same evening after the party, or, at the furthest, early next morning. Her attention was frequently rewarded by a present of the dress which she had so punctually restored; and she began now to have a wardrobe of her own.

There was hope of a girl of this shrewd thoughtful sort, "riding in her coach." Her mother had already begun to exercise the strictest vigilance over her movements. The padlock was in hourly use, but it was not clapped upon the mind.—The violence of the furious mother, and the sufferings and terror of the poor girl, are illustrated by the following anecdote:—After one of those rows in which Miss Harriot, at last, learned to hold her own part, the poor girl having received many blows, ran away, and spent the cold night in the fields; nor did she venture to creep to the manager's until twilight on the next day, when she was famishing with hunger, and blue with cold:—

Mr and Mrs Entwisle, by an unfortunate chance, entered the room. Like a startled hare, Harriot flew into a corner behind the chairs to avoid her mother, who exclaimed—"Let me reach her—I will be the death of her!" All violence was, however, prevented, by the family of the manager, except the violence of a tongue which nothing could allay. "Where have you passed the night, you young hussy? You, a high-born person's child, to go away from your mother—yes, you are a great person's daughter, though you behave so ill to me—but we little guessed the wretch you would turn out!"

Such was the amiable mother of Miss Mellon, whose ambition and low cunning had yet no other object than her daughter's aggrandizement. As the mother did not obtrude herself into society—which would have spoiled all—but shewed herself grateful and proud of any attention shewn to her daughter, the shrewd and lively girl obtained a footing in several respectable families in Burton-on-Trent and Stafford, and was even patronised by ladies of fashion in those places. And where she found an opening, she never failed to improve the advantage. Her poor mother strove to keep her neatly dressed; and she made a rule both to take her to the door of the houses at which she was invited, and to fetch her home. The old ladies of Stafford gave her a high character as a well-conducted, industrious girl; highly-amusing, a pleasant singer, and a good dancer, and the most punctual person in returning whatever she borrowed neat and unspoiled.

In Mr and Mrs Entwisle's rows, they frequently broke all the crockery and glasses, and Miss Harriot had often to attend the rehearsals without her breakfast. Her miseries at home procured her sympathy and consideration abroad. She was received as a guest in a clergyman's family, and, finally, was patronised by the family of a banker in Stafford, named Wright. That town was, at this period, represented by Mr Sheridan, who, on one of his electioneering visits, saw Miss Mellon (a handsome girl of seventeen) play in the "Belle's Stratagem," and the "Romp." In his usual hyperbolical style, he praised the talents of the dramatic favourite of Stafford, and held out some vague hope of a London engagement, which he was, afterwards, dunned into confirming by a positive promise.

Thus making her happy at the moderate expense of a compliment and a promise, he departed, after his week of acting popularity. Mrs Entwisle was enraptured, and saw visions of benefits and coronets. Mr Entwisle dreamt of the bliss of perfect idleness; and as for Harriot, she was not sane enough even to think or dream. She did nothing but watch the post which was to bring news of the engagement. But all her friends doubted whether their volatile member would give the matter a second thought; and they were right.

No letter ever came; and when Miss Mellon applied once more to Mr Wright the banker, entreating him to jog the great manager's memory, an evasive answer was returned—"It was not worth Miss Mellon's while, with her talents, to appear at the end of a season." But Mrs Entwisle and Miss Mellon were not thus to be baffled without another trial. Her benefit had produced fifty pounds and presents, and the family moved to London, to push Harriot's fortune. With the Wrights, her grandest friends, who had been very kind to her, she renewed her intimacy after she became a great woman; and, on her departure, When Miss Mellon went to take farewell of her best friends, Mr Wright, sen., with a care almost paternal, gave her a small sum of money for her own use, and uttered the gratifying prophetic words (remembered by his descendants,) "Farewell, Harriot; heaven bless you, child. If you conduct yourself as well as you have done ever since you have been known to our family, I shall see or hear of you riding in your own carriage!"

Mrs Baron-Wilson does not admire Sheridan: neither do we. It is scarcely possible to imagine a character more vicious and debased, in a man who escaped open disgrace. One rejoices to find opinion righting itself about the individual whose convivial wit, and, to say the least, unscrupulousness, for a time threw a false and mischievous glare around him. The following extract illustrates the character of both Sheridan and our much more respectable heroine:—

The family party reached the metropolis in June, without friend or acquaintance, trusting solely to the promise of a manager almost unknown to them, and with a very slender stock of money to support them, in case of any delay respecting an engagement.

The theatre had closed during the preceding month; therefore they considered that Mr Sheridan was likely to be disengaged, and able at once to inform them of his decision. Accordingly, Miss Mellon, accompanied to the door by her mother, waited on him the day succeeding her arrival, to state the hopes which had brought her to London. After much hesitation, she was received by the great manager in the most slovenly of morning costumes, unshaven, and bearing the exhausted, dull look of the overnight's conviviality.

Mr Sheridan had not only forgotten his promise to Mr Wright, but even Miss Mellon's name and appearance; nor was it until the production of his own letter to Mr Wright, (in which he had desired Miss Mellon to come to London,) that he could recall any recollection of the circumstance.

He then became prodigal of fine speeches to the mortified young creature, who was nearly fainting from this her first experience of worldly sincerity. He praised her mode of speaking, her effective personal appearance for her profession, and sent her away with an indefinite promise about "keeping her in his mind," which she could not very clearly understand, nor, perhaps, had he any intention that she should!

On Miss Mellon rejoining Mrs Entwisle, the latter overwhelmed her with reproaches for "not having made Mr Sheridan give her an engagement for the opening season!" and, on the next day, the matron resolved to try her own skill for her daughter. But the diplomacy of the manager (whom Mrs Gore has lately defined as "the arch master of finesse!") far exceeded the arts of his untutored countrywoman; and she returned home from her fruitless errand, saying, "I saw he was telling me lies all the time, yet I could not catch him out with a direct one!"

The proverb of "Fair words cost nothing" (which must have originated in Ireland) seems to have been Mr Sheridan's motto; for instead of stating at once the unwelcome truth, that "there was no vacancy for another actress at Drury Lane," he kept these poor people in uncertainty during three months, by his unmeaning promises, thereby preventing them from returning to the country, or accepting engagements from minor companies.

At first they had taken lodgings near the Strand, in order to have a respectable address for the manager's expected communications; but as their means gradually melted, the provident Mrs Entwisle considered the situation to be too dear, and accordingly they removed to a small house in New Street.

We are treated to some town adventures of the simple rustic Miss Mellon, (who had only trode the boards for above a dozen years,) which really look overdone, admitting the difference between London and the provincial towns. Her best feat was wheedling and coaxing a coachman into driving her over half the town without hire—"Would not dear old Mr Coachman put her on just another street?" This was something to be proud of, though neither her greatest nor last conquest over the proverbial niggardliness and prejudices of old gentlemen. In Staffordshire, a Mr Jervis, a magistrate, had so strong a prejudice to "vagrant players" that he would never grant them a license in his jurisdiction. Miss Mellon came, however, according to the story, favourably under the notice of Mr Jervis, from having behaved with proper spirit when unceremoniously treated by his nephew and another London dandy, who did her the honour of requesting that she would descend from her rural chamber in a miller's house, with whose sister she was staying, and receive their visit.

The amiable old pair took a great fancy to the artless, animated Miss Mellon, or, as she was always called there, "Little Harriot the player." She managed so well as to remove the prejudice of the magistrate; and actually, by her ingenuous grace, wheedled him into granting a license for the obnoxious performances, besides patronising them afterwards.

The authoress remarks:—

There must have been something unusually winning and genuine in the disposition and manner of Miss Mellon; for it would be tedious to enumerate the number of instances in which the money-making mind of tradespeople seemed to take a higher tone of generosity in her favour.

Miss Mellon had come from the provinces heart-whole. Indeed, save her grand passion, sentimental or platonic, for old Mr Coutts, which came on by very small degrees, she never appears to have had any love-attachment. Her vanity was, at one time, somewhat interested by the attentions of a half-swindler, a West Indian, named Barry, who gave himself out as the heir of a very rich lady; but the fraud was discovered, and the fact of the real object of admiration being Miss Mellon's salary, Mr Barry was cast off with becoming spirit, and without any injury to the peace of mind of the young lady. Her mother often saw or suspected "detrimentals" in poor young men who got acquainted with Harriot, and was violent against such connexions; but no "actress's mother" could have desired a more prudent child. There was no sentiment, no romance in Miss Harriot; and, besides, her mother's watchfulness never abated. When her daughter was enjoying the valuable patronage of Mr Coutts, a Belgian colonel, introduced by Mr Coutts, visited in Little Russell Street, where the millionaire now regularly lunched. Mrs Entwisle heard of this suspicious guest, and hurried up from Cheltenham, where she was settled with her husband, who, through her daughter's influence with Colonel Macmahon, "the Prince's friend," had been appointed postmaster there,—in virtue of her solicitation and his utter unfitness for the office. He was soon dismissed, in spite of his useful connexions. Mrs Entwisle travelled by the night coach, and entered her daughter's house just after breakfast.

She threw herself on the sofa—her countenance darkened with rage; and, after various strong interjections, screamed forth, "That starving black fellow, I'll be the death of him!"

Miss Mellon vainly endeavoured to ascertain who was the subject of so much vituperation; guessing it was another version of the old anti-matrimonial lecture, yet never imagining that "the starving black fellow" could allude to Colonel Raguet, whose means were apparently ample, and who, moreover, was a fair, light-haired person.

She was at length enlightened by her mother saying, "He shan't marry you, Harriot—I'd kill him first! his very name proves him a beggar. Mr Raggy, indeed! Just think of your being called Mrs Raggy; a nasty, black, deceiving, fortune-hunting, foreign fellow; if you marry him, I'll be the death of you both!"

Argument was vain with the furious woman, so Miss Mellon did not attempt an explanation; and, in the midst of the storm, Colonel Raguet and a friend entered unannounced, for probably the old landlady was either baking muffins or measuring out milk at the time.

Colonel Raguet spoke excellent English; and, finding a seat next to Mrs Entwisle, rendered himself so agreeable that she was delighted with his conversation. After staying some time, the visitors departed, and she was enchanted with "that nice fair-haired man, who must be a gentleman of fortune, from his dress and his horses; and if Harriot was going to make a fool of herself by marrying anybody, why did she not fancy that real fine gentleman, who treated her with such respect, instead of that penniless, worthless, ugly, black, ragged vagabond, Miss Raggy, who was sure to beat her!"

We return to the amiable Entwises and their daughter, in a cottage rented at less than £10 a-year, somewhere about what is now the Surrey Zoological Gardens. For this dwelling the shrewd and active old lady, aware of the expense of furnished lodgings, and always trying to pay her way, purchased a table and three cane-chairs, with other household gear on the same moderate scale; and, while waiting Mr Sheridan's awful fiat, mother and daughter gratified their tastes by fatiguing Sunday walks to see the fine people in the far distant Park. Their shabby finery and country habiliments drew impertinent remarks upon them, and offended Miss Mellon's sense of dignity as a householder.

She would make her mother return to their little Surrey cage, (with its sitting-room about two yards square, holding a table and three rush-chairs only,) and, in a fever of vexation, she would burst out crying, and say, "Perhaps those impudent people have not a nice place with furniture of their own like ours!"

The summer passed, and Sheridan continued obdurate, after Miss Mellon had applied to him much oftener than could be pleasant to the feelings of either a lodger or householder. The banker at Stafford was again applied to; and, at long last, having obtained an interview and reading, and, probably, flattering Sherry into good humour, Miss Mellon obtained an engagement at thirty shillings a-week, and came out in Lydia Languish. Her success in this character was very moderate; and Sheridan remanded her to a sort of probation for a time, that she might get familiarized with theatrical business upon the gigantic metropolitan scale. Michaelmas Day came round, and we have this illustration of some points of Miss Mellon's religion:—

Mrs Entwisle had brought her up with a firm belief in the necessity of complying with the superstitious customs attached to certain days, the omission of which would infallibly be followed by ill luck; and, therefore, the Christmas mince-pie, Shrove-Tuesday pancakes, Easter tansy-pudding, or Michaelmas goose, must be tasted, though in ever so small a quantity—nay, even though disagreeable to the partaker, as was her own case respecting the Michaelmas dainty. An anecdote regarding the latter has been sent us by an individual who collects her in New Street. To him she regretted bitterly that, on her first metropolitan 29th of September, she should not be able to purchase a goose, for the sake of tasting a small portion to bring good luck. He adds, that the girlish delight she felt was excessive, on being informed that at some cook-shop near Drury Lane, she might purchase even one quarter, from the dish she only desired for its consequent good fortune. The little portion was accordingly procured, and Miss Mellon and her relatives were quite satisfied in having thus fulfilled a superstitious duty at the appointed season.

It must be admitted, even by us "doubters" concerning luck, that, if we are to judge by the event, Miss Mellon's system of tempting the smiles of Dame Fortune, was more successful than any which "reasoning people" can recommend!

The first five golden guineas that Countts gave her at her benefit at Cheltenham, the largest present—as players call the charities which degrade their profession—she had ever received, she kept ever sacred as "luck-money." Those guineas were certainly attractive of gold. A good deal of mere book-making is executed with an account of Miss Mellon's performances in London and the provinces, and green-room anecdotes. It may be dismissed in one word. She had no genius for the drama; she could not feel, nor simulate feeling. She had no genius for anything; but she was industrious, persevering, shrewd in every way, and always desirous to make herself useful; and thus she won her way to better parts and a higher salary, by imperceptible degrees. In summer, she procured country engagements, and was a great favourite at Liverpool. This was about the year 1795. Mrs Siddons was gracious to her; and, next winter, during the absence of Mrs Jordan, she obtained some of this great actress's parts, and filled them respectably. Her provincial benefits and other emoluments now enabled the family to take better lodgings, and to come nearer the theatre; and they, finally, removed to Little Russell Street, to which poor lane the most noble Duchess long made an annual pilgrimage on foot, to view the spot, and "shed tears of pleasure." When Miss Farren came to her promotion by the death of the Countess of Derby, the funeral of the Duke of Hamilton's unfortunate daughter being immediately followed by the marriage of her rival, the admired actress, a further opening was made for the display of Miss Mellon's talents. She was, however, getting on so slowly at Drury Lane, that at one period she ruminated upon accepting a more lucrative engagement from Astley; but calculation and far-sighted ambition prevailed. Luckily; for, observes Mrs Baron-Wilson,

It is curious to reflect what change in the complexion of her fortunes might have resulted from her acceptance of Astley's offer. In all human probability she would in that case never have become Mrs Coutts.

After Miss Mellon had got her mother and Entwisle settled at Cheltenham, she frequently visited them, and performed at the theatre there. The place was then rapidly rising; and the scheming Mrs Entwisle proposed laying out her daughter's savings in building. One house was accordingly erected, and let at a high rent, and Mrs Entwisle contemplated a whole row. Meanwhile, Mr King, the master of the ceremonies, had the audacity to build on vacant ground immediately opposite Miss Mellon's house, and, by intercepting the view, lessened the value of her property. The angry and clamorous mother urged her daughter to come down to Cheltenham, to perform and take a benefit, and overwhelm the master of the ceremonies; and now, at last, we get fairly to the golden dawn of Miss Mellon's brilliant day, and to old Coutts:—

Mrs Entwisle, by her frank lively manner, and love of gossip, was very popular among the middle classes; so that, with her innate skill, she had always the power of "making good her own story" to a large majority, who, in their turn, spread the story further; and, therefore, when she detailed how "hardly the master of ceremonies had behaved to the dutiful child, who had relinquished every shilling of her earnings for her mother's support," there were few residents in Cheltenham who did not hear of and sympathize in the tale.

Miss Mellon accordingly came down to gather a golden harvest from such well-prepared ground. Her female friend, of course, accompanied her; and when these two handsome and ladylike young women, guarded by the Argus parent, Mrs Entwisle, went round to request patronage, it may be supposed that few were inclined to refuse them: in short, Miss Mellon's benefit was such a dazzling triumph over the mortified master of ceremonies, that it is said he never forgave it.

At that time there was, among the visitors at Cheltenham, an elderly invalid gentleman, who did not join in society, but passed many hours daily taking exercise in the Long Walk. Mrs Entwisle soon discovered, from hints dropped by his servant to the lodging people, who, however, did not know his name, that "his master, notwithstanding his penurious appearance, was considered one of the richest people in London; but that he was very unhappy in consequence of thinking that his wife, also advanced in years, was going out of her mind, which preyed on his spirits so much that he had been ill, and was now trying Cheltenham for a change."

Her immediate reflection was, that the richest gentleman in London might take a box at the theatre for the benefit night, though he were ever so sad; and this idea was communicated to her daughter. A respectful note of solicitation to that effect was given to the attendant at the pump-room, a few days before the performance, to present to "the remarkable-looking old gentleman;" but as no answer was returned, the three females decided that "the moping, thin, old creature, was too full of his own troubles to care about those of other people."

On the day but one after sending their note, Miss Mellon and her friend were sauntering very early in the Long Walk, when they were overtaken by the old gentleman.

He introduced himself to Miss Mellon, whom he said he knew by sight in Drury Lane green-room, to apologize for not having sooner answered the application, for which he accounted by a great pressure of London correspondence; but he trusted his silence had been considered an assent to patronising her laudable filial efforts, of which he had heard admirable accounts at every turn in Cheltenham.

The young ladies tendered their best thanks and brightest smiles; their new friend mentioned that he had had the pleasure that morning of sending to the post office his answer respecting the box; and, after a conversation of some length, they separated, mutually pleased.

On hastening home, they found Mrs Entwisle in ecstasies. There is no knowing what grand visions had been conjured up in her wild brain; but the tangible circumstance was, that she held in her hand an open letter from the old gentleman, "the richest person in London," who had enclosed five guineas for a box, which he desired should be kept for Mr Coutts! Mr Coutts! —THE Mr Coutts!—well might the servant hint that his master was "the richest person in London," a man whose name was a proverb of wealth even in country towns. Thus Mrs Entwisle raved, wondering at her husband's stupidity, that when any one had called for letters to Mr Coutts, he had not directly guessed he was the thin old gentleman, and told her so! But the young friends defended Mr Entwisle, by exclaiming against the idea of any one supposing that the great Mr Coutts, who managed the royal family, and commanded everything he liked, could be an old, pallid, sickly, thin gentleman, in a shabby coat and brown scratch wig.

Peace was soon restored, as Mrs Entwisle was in a sunny humour after the day's adventure. The new acquaintance met generally in their early promenade in the Long Walk; and when the day of the benefit performance arrived, Mr Coutts paid Miss Mellon the compliment of promising to occupy the box, although he had only taken it to patronise her, without intending to go.

As a mark of Miss Mellon's strong superstition regarding good luck, may be given the following pendant to the foregoing facts.

The story of the golden luck-money follows. On her wedding day, Mrs Coutts shewed the five guineas, and they were again produced on the day that she honoured the young Duke of St Albans with her hand. The happy acquaintance which ensured her the "blameless patronage," and ultimately the fortune of Coutts, commenced in 1805.

From the period of the first introduction of Mr Coutts to Miss Mellon at Cheltenham, a constant and friendly intercourse was kept up between them in London. There is little reason to doubt that this friendship was promoted by the scheming Mrs Entwisle, by every expedient she could devise.

But Miss Mellon was now separated from her mother, and perfectly adequate to the management of her own affairs, and throve better perhaps without the old lady. The biographer gives her own ideas regarding the conduct of mother and daughter towards the rich banker.

On this principle, then, we shall give here our ideas regarding the conduct of Mrs Entwisle and her daughter towards Mr Coutts.

Numbers of their warm advocates assert, that they had no idea of Mr Coutts becoming attached to and marrying Miss Mellon; but that they merely sought to take advantage of a weak and rich old man's patronage as long as it would last.

From this opinion we differ totally. Let it be remembered how ambitious Mrs Entwisle was, how unceasingly watchful to advance her child's position in the world, how careful (even ostentatiously so) regarding her daughter's moral conduct, never allowing her to be out alone, even when in humble life; so that she might bring with her a thoroughly good reputation. In addition to her ambition, Mrs Entwisle was selfish, and inordinately fond of money. Hence, she had prevented her daughter from marrying through affection; because the former would derive no improvement in situation by it. She was clever, artful, and scheming, like the generality of the Irish peasantry; and, considering all her qualities together, we have little hesitation in expressing an opinion that, from this first introduction to the old banker, she had marked him for her daughter's husband.

But it was only the "blessed Harriot" herself who could accomplish this wish.

We see and hear of such plans daily in the higher circles, where the system is for young innocent girls to try and barter their hands for rank and wealth, no matter how revolting the possessor of these advantages may be; and, in these nefarious schemes, we know that jewelled matrons lend the most incessant aid to their beautiful daughters, by plots to "take in" any one they mark down as fair game.

Why not, then, an humble edition of Almack's practices in Mrs Entwisle and Miss Mellon? A legal gentleman, long in the busy world, has assured the writer that there existed a bond between Mr Coutts and Miss Mellon, that if she would remain unmarried while his invalid wife survived, he would marry her whenever his hand was free to offer.

For such bonds there is the great precedent of Miss Farren and the Earl of Derby; and, in our own times, the engagement of the "much esteemed Miss Stephens." Notwithstanding these high and virtuous examples, we have yet to learn that such engagements have come to be generally considered reputable. To continue:—

On their return to London, the conduct of Mr Coutts shews clearly that he intended to place Miss Mellon at the head of his house; for one of his earliest proceedings was to present her to his three daughters, the Marchioness of Bute, the Countess of Guildford, and Lady Burdett. From the time of Mr Coutts' first acquaintance with Miss Mellon, until his wife's death, these three irreproachable ladies were on the most sister-like habits of intimacy with Miss Mellon. They were at her house in Little Russell Street continually, the shopkeepers there recollecting their wonder at such grand carriages waiting for hours at so poor a place. They used to meet their father there by appointment, to call to take him home. These ladies were married to men of the world, and had daughters grown up; therefore there was every reason why they should have looked with rigid scrutiny at the stranger whom they invited to their houses, and at whose house they allowed their children to stay. They used frequently to make parties to lunch with Miss Mellon. The Marquis and Marchioness of Bute, with Lord Dudley Stuart and his sister, Lady Frances Sandon, did so several times.

Miss Mellon's manner towards Mr Coutts, which was totally different to her careless style, was doubtless the result of her mother's tutorage, and certainly was politic in the extreme. It was steady and respectful, like a daughter, perfectly free from any levity, (every one who knew the parties states this,) and, to prove her respect, no office was too humble; for instance, she never allowed a servant to open the door when he knocked, but either went down herself or requested the young lady living with her to do so.

From her steady demeanour, she was generally considered by her friends to be an unacknowledged daughter of Mr Coutts; and, from the friendship shewn to her by his daughters, they had possibly formed a similar conclusion.

The Ladies Bute, Guildford, and Burdett, would probably have repudiated the sisterhood; nor were they likely to believe in the "unacknowledged daughter." For the rest, the existence of their mother gave them security against that folly in their father, which, when he did marry, so strongly excited the indignation of the whole connexion. But it seems that the eccentricity and the "strong vein of romance—the high-flown romance" of the shrewd banker's character—laid him particularly open to the designs of Mrs

Entwisle. There is little doubt that the mother filled her subordinate part well when she had anything to do; but the winning Harriot—now twenty-eight years of age, even by the lowest estimate—must have ably backed her. The daughter soon became all in all to the vain, and lonely, and dotting old man, who seems to have lived friendless and joyless in the midst of his enormous riches and numerous descendants. How he must have been caressed and flattered, and how gratified by the unremitted devotion—the entire dedication—to him of his "blessed Harriot," we incidentally gather from his widow's subsequent freaks and affectations, which were not even given up after she married the Duke of St Albans. If at first she might have been content to "burn old Simon" to warm her newer suitor, she afterwards took vehemently to "the dear old bit of wood;" and her last respectfully worded request, on feeling the approach of her own dissolution, was, that she might be removed to die in the room "where Tom Coutts had died." At that awful hour there may have been sincerity in her grateful feelings for the infatuated old man who had worshipped her; though, in imputing affectation, if not insincerity, we do her no injustice. We are told here that

The name of Mr Coutts was continually on her lips, his virtues magnified by the exaggerating power of affection—his statue the only ornament of her state room—his portrait decorating her favourite boudoir. The pillow on which he died was always placed in her carriage while travelling, as she never slept on any other.

"The blameless patronage of Mr Coutts" was, at first, of great use to Miss Mellon in her profession, and

Besides a great accession of theatrical "friends," the extreme probability of her eventual, and, perhaps not distant, union with Mr Coutts occasioned Miss Mellon to be courted by a highly respectable and increasing acquaintance; and all ranks, from his Royal Highness the Duke of York to individuals of much humbler class, were daily making interest to inspect the interior arena of the new theatre.

She was now often, from good-natured impulses, liberal in money, and her friends took the liberty of guessing whence came the funds that were expended with a rather ostentatious charity or munificence; she was also become mistress of Holly Lodge and a carriage, and ventured on considerable insolence of manners where it was safe to do so. Yet she remembered the days of poverty, and, among other good deeds, was the secret benefactress of Kean, when he was waiting, in the utmost distress, the fiat of the Drury Lane manager, as she had done that of Sheridan many years before. Miss Tidswell, his aunt, (and, by some probable accounts, his mother,) had long been her intimate friend, which might have moved her sympathy for poor Kean. By some perverse accident or other, her secret deeds of charity always found fame, and we do not imagine that she blushed very distressingly upon such occasions. But there was more than money given, there was really good-heartedness shewn by one of the grand dames of Old Drury.

On the morning of Kean's first appearance she was introduced to him during the rehearsal, at her own request; of her motive there can be no doubt. He appeared distressed. Oxberry, who knew Kean, introduced them; Kean, perhaps, guessed her intention—be this as it may, his manner was such, that, it is believed, she feared she might rather wound than soothe his feelings. Kean always spoke of her in terms of admiration, and he was so truly a democrat, that he could seldom be brought to utter a word in favour of the rich, be they who they might. Her kindness (for in the forlorn situation in which a poor, ill-used, and ill-dressed provincial actor stands at our national theatres, even to speak to him is a kindness) was strongly contrasted to, and not improbably caused by, the cruel and uncalled for observations of an actress of great histrionic merit, who “wondered where the little wretch had been picked up!” and even went the length of advising him “to return to the country; for, amid such actors as surrounded him he could have no chance.”

Miss Mellon's retirement had been speculated upon since her Cheltenham conquest, many years before; but she performed for several years, and, in 1815, left the stage abruptly. She had previously showed more of her mamma's temper than was agreeable to her theatrical companions, and, for some time, Mr Coutts had taken offence at some of the theatrical persons who appeared at her dinners. “Her success in life,” we are told, or, in other words, the generosity of her friend, “had excited the envious malignity of the less fortunate.” Our main debate with Mrs Baron-Wilson is, that she will affirm the “good fortune” the great luck of her heroine. Mr Coutts, though generally so munificent to her, was apt to take miserly fits, or whims and caprices of stinginess in paltry matters.

In brief, Miss Mellon was on ticklish ground, and Mrs Coutts was dying. This was not unknown to her, and theatrical quarrels and squabbles got to a height which Coutts could not always tolerate. Mr Coutts was also liable to little jealous or pettish fits, and the following scene, it is said, led to his protégée's retirement:—

On the 7th of February, Miss Mellon was announced to perform Audrey, in “As you Like it.” On repairing to her dressing room she found the door locked; but as she had brought her costume, she dressed in the ante-room of the private box.

Mr Coutts, whose great delight was to attend the theatre, fancied himself to be sufficiently well to be present at the performance; and he arrived soon after the play had commenced. Miss Mellon was considered the handsomest Audrey on the stage, the French peasant costume suiting her style. On this evening her dress was extremely fanciful and pretty, being a peculiar shaped black velvet hat, a yellow jacket, laced with black velvet, and a gold cross and heart on her throat: while the striped, full, and rather short petticoat, revealed very neat feet and ankles, in little buckled shoes, and yellow silk stockings, with black clocks.

She was greeted with much applause, as being a favourite of the audience, and one who had not lately been much before them; so that, when the early scenes were over, she went to speak to Mr Coutts, flushed with success, and hoping for his compliment also.

She was, however, disappointed in finding his kind countenance wearing a serious expression, as, taking her hand, he said that he could not allow her to appear thus again.

In dismay she inquired what was his meaning, and he explained that he could not bear to see her “made up” for the stage, and in such an absurd costume. He therefore hoped this would be her last appearance.

His requests were so few, and she always had attended to them with such deference for his better judgment, that the matter of her retirement was settled from that moment: all originating perhaps in the “smart little yellow stockings with black clocks.” She returned to the stage for her final scene, and at its close, having whispered to the astonished Touchstone, that “she should never again be his Audrey,” she stepped rather in advance of the other performers, curtsied profoundly several times to the applauding audience, not as Audrey, but as Miss Mellon, and such was the sole intimation and leave taking of her last appearance.

What did not Papa Coutts owe in requital for this prompt obedience, this entire devotion, in his adopted child!

Her biographer allows that her paragon of all the virtues had some little faults. She was reported to be profuse in the expenses of her table, even while Miss Mellon; but, with Coutts' bank at her beck, that, we submit, was a trifle. She was, also, somewhat ostentatious with her liberalities, but then she was liberal; and Dibdin bears testimony to her kindness, which it is fair and pleasant to repeat. “While many highly-respected actors have become extremely rich, and many virtuous and deserving actresses have been espoused by nobility and men of large possessions, very few if any have had the kind retrospection to assist or patronise their former professional associates.” In an actor's eye, this neglect must be a deadly sin. One of her leading faults was blind ignorant fits of passion, in the style of her mother, directed against any one in whom she imagined offence against her state and dignity. She gave way to very furious outbreaks of rage. “At times the veriest trifle would cause such displeasure, that all dreaded where it might chance to fall; and, under this excitement, nothing that could be said or done at the moment could subdue it.” . . . “She had been too long accustomed to command not to be extremely wilful; and nothing turned her determination from a point on which she had fixed, except her own altered resolution.” . . . “Many persons include fickleness among her defects;” and, “finally, if a degree of pride or hauteur belonged to her disposition, it must not excite wonder, considering her rapid elevation, and the mixture of mortifications forced into her enjoyments in some few instances, against which a naturally high spirit would rebel.” In brief, the old proverb held—“Set a beggar on horseback,” &c. Miss Mellon did not ride out the race, but she often indulged in a canter on that road, and delighted to splash the poor plodding pedestrians, her old compeers.

Coutts must have been seventy-three, but as probably seventy-five, when he was first subjected to the fascinations of the experienced actress, who had been scrambling about the world for twenty-eight years. In 1815, his wife died, at a very advanced age. The unhappy lady (happy so far in being unconscious of her husband's folly and her own condition) had accidentally scalded herself to death. Her husband, then upwards of fourscore, chanced to be ill at the time; but the tragi-comedy which follows deserves to be given in the author's own words. On Twelfth Day, Miss Mellon, who must have been well aware of the dying condition of Mrs Coutts, who languished for some time after her accident, saw her amiable mother depart for Cheltenham.

After her departure, Miss Mellon, (who was always superstitious, and had, moreover, an especial dread of any occurrence on Twelfth Day) described to those around her, that "she was oppressed with an overwhelming presentiment that she and her beloved mother might never meet again, and that her sensations were beyond description miserable." Her kind old benefactor also had been confined to his bed for some days; she had received no accounts of him; and fancying that he might be dying also, her excitable spirits gave way, and burying her face in the sofa pillow, she wept bitterly for a length of time.

At last she heard her name feebly uttered, and, on looking up, beheld the figure of Mr Coutts, holding by the door at which he had entered unheard. The early hour was quite unusual for his visits, which were always about two o'clock. His look was so ghastly, his tall miserable figure so attenuated by illness, his sunken eyes and faint voice were altogether so unearthly, that Miss Mellon, (who had not seen him for some days during his illness) thought he had died on the fatal Twelfth Day, and now reappeared to her. The poor man, indeed, was but little removed from death; he tottered to a chair, and saying, "Harriot, she is dead," covered his face, and wept heavily.

Miss Mellon's superstitious impression was, that her mother had been killed by an accident; and the wild scene of grief which ensued was highly painful. Mr Coutts at last had strength to explain that Mrs Coutts was that morning released from her frightful sufferings; and, though she had long been incapable of companionship for any one, yet, being the mother of his family, he was overcome by the shock, though long expected, and, since her incurable accident, less to be regretted.

After making this communication, which he would not entrust to another, the invalid was carried down stairs by his servants, lifted into the carriage, and taken home to his bed.

One of the most wicked of the falsehoods told against Miss Mellon was, the statement that she was married to Mr Coutts within a few days after his first wife's death.

Surely "most wicked" is a strong phrase. With the long-understood engagement of the very suitable parties, considering the whole preliminary proceedings, a few days, or even weeks, could be of no earthly consequence. But the invalid, Mr Coutts, was not quite ready to go through the ceremony, though the delay, as it might affect his "blessed Harriot," pressed heavily on his conscience! "Miss Mellon's youth was passing away,"!

And although he had given ample fortunes to his daughters, yet in his dying hours he could not bequeath a reward for Miss Mellon's attention and excellent conduct, without leaving grounds of alander which would turn his kindness into poison for her proud mind.

We hope the reader will preserve his gravity, if possible. Coutts sent for Raymond, the manager, "the great friend" of Miss Mellon, and requested his advice! Less than marriage would not save Miss Mellon's fair fame if he left her money by his will; just as if he had not been all along giving her money. Let the reader be grave and read on.

Mr Coutts then suggested the only alternative, namely, that they might be privately married, to give her a just claim to the sum he wished to bequeath, in case of his sudden demise; but he expressed a dread that Miss Mellon, with her superstitious feelings, and ideas of propriety, would not be brought to consent to an early marriage, although his extreme illness should be sufficient warning against procrastination.

Mr Raymond had as little hope, knowing her wilful character and veneration for death; and Mr Coutts was in despair, at his inability to justify one who had suffered much annoyance for his sake. He knew Miss Mellon placed more reliance on Mr Raymond's advice than on that of any other professional acquaintance, and therefore the invalid offered him one thousand pounds if he obtained her consent.

Mrs Entwisle, with her bold and impudent inventions, could never have played her cards half so well. She wanted skill, if not will. There can be no doubt that Coutts must have been in absolute dotage. One of his brothers died, after having been confined in a lunatic asylum for thirty years: another had fallen into mental imbecility as he advanced in life. He also must, at this time, have been a monomaniac in the hands of artful unprincipled people. Never else could he have so disgraced himself, and offered such gross insult to his daughters and his grown-up granddaughters, as that sudden marriage. We continue the narrative:—

The physicians had given their opinion, that their patient required incessant and careful watching in his dangerous state; therefore there was no falsehood in the plea used by the ambassador.

When he went on his awkward mission, Miss Mellon—who was in great distress at the illness of her friend—received the account of his increased suffering with deep anxiety. Lengthened reference was made to all his kindness to her and his family; then "the irreparable loss his demise would be to so many persons; the physicians' report, that the sole chance of his recovery depended on the incessant attention of some one interested for him; and, finally, that the sufferer had fixed his mind on having that attendance from her only, beseeching her thus to save his life!"

Miss Mellon, agonized at the thought of losing one who had supplied the place of an indulgent father to her, saw, however, that even in case of his increased danger, she could not with propriety go to his house. Then Mr Raymond proposed the alternative of matrimony; but she refused, with a decision which even startled one who well knew her violent impetuosity.

They were several hours together; and, from the angry bursts of voice, a friend who waited for Mr Raymond, thought some unpleasant dispute had arisen which his interference might quell; but, on entering the room, he saw poor old Mr Raymond actually kneeling in entreaty before Miss Mellon, and the latter standing in such a state of excitement, that the unnoticed witness was glad to retire hastily from a scene which seemed past his influence.

Mr Raymond, skilled in human nature, allowed this violence to exhaust itself; and, when it changed to hysterical weeping, he taxed her with ingratitude to the only friend she ever possessed, in caring for the world's opinion of a delay more than for the chance of saving her benefactor's life; and he worked on her sympathies by every plea in the power of his eloquence to urge. He quoted the example of Miss Farren, whom she had admired so much; who, for a length of time, was publicly known to have been engaged to the Earl of Derby during even the lifetime of his first Countess; after whose decease, Miss Farren was married to the widower within six weeks, without having a plea of his dangerous illness urged as the cause of such promptitude; and yet no one had been more respected or better received in society than the second Lady Derby. Why not the second Mrs Coutts likewise? as the first Mrs Coutts had been morally "dead" to the world for years! At last, worn out, if not convinced, Miss Mellon agreed that, if her benefactor still continued dangerously ill, by a given time she would obtain, by a private marriage, the privilege of going to his house to nurse him, should an increase of danger require it.*

Admirable, blessed, single-minded, devoted Harriot! It was to tender pity and affection that she yielded at last! We do not pretend to believe one word of all this—even as an acted drama, it must have been better managed—and yet own that Mr Raymond fairly earned his thousand pounds; and we hope Mrs Coutts, when she read her husband's will, made it at least two. She was always liberal to Raymond. That "most wicked falsehood," that the marriage took place in a few days after the first wife's death, which so "shocks and revolts" Mrs Baron-Wilson, is triumphantly rebutted; for it was fourteen days—each no doubt an age to the parties—before Mr Coutts was able to smuggle himself out to St Pancras' Church; where he received that long-coveted blessing, the hand of his adored Harriot, and Mr Raymond, in a snuff-box, of what metal is not said, his one thousand pounds.

The marriage was kept a dead secret, and Miss Mellon every day drove to her husband's door to receive the physician's bulletin of health. Perhaps Mr Coutts had not yet made his will; but, however that might be, or if the devoted Harriot was now prepared for the eclaireissement, or for braving and defying the indignation of the family—

In about a month from the time of the marriage she drove one morning to the door in Stratton Street, and one of the physicians came down with great concern, to tell her Mr Coutts was considerably worse. Alarmed out of all her caution, she clasped her hands and cried, "Good heavens, tell me all! I am his wife!" The astonished physician then very forcibly described the danger of Mr Coutts; and it was resolved that she must at once assume her place in the house of her husband, the crisis of his illness requiring unremitting care.

Such was, in reality, the "gay honeymoon" of the poor dying old man of eighty-six, and the greatly afflicted object of his regard!

The afflicted bride! we must sympathize with her! But Mr Coutts rallied, and the marriage was afterwards publicly celebrated "by a numerous assemblage of high distinction."

Poor Mrs Entwistle! how she must have exulted in the great match of her well-tutored, high-blooded daughter, for whom "Tom Coutts in point of birth was really no match." It is not likely that she ever saw the Lady of Woodham Walters in her married life, for she died in the sixty-third year of her age, in the following May, of gossip and drinking fat ale. Her funeral, by order of her daughter, was on the most splendid scale. It was discovered that, while ever crying out poverty, she had hoarded seven hundred guineas in specie. Entwistle with this wind-fall, ate and drank, but was not very merry, for four more years, when Mrs Coutts erected a monument over him and her mother; which was afterwards succeeded by another, bearing the name and title of their affectionate, and humble-minded daughter HARRIOT, DUCHESS OF ST ALBANS. What a fortunate woman was Mrs Coutts now; yet the attacks of the "profligate press," and the coldness of the Coutts family, and of those who adopted their opinions, made her life a burden to her. To preserve Mr Coutts alive was now her earnest endeavour; but she was unfortunate in her choice of physicians. We may imagine how Mr Coutts' daughters took the singular scene here described—

While Mr Coutts was at Salt Hill, he fell and broke three of his ribs, an accident which caused serious alarm at his time of life. His sufferings were extreme; Mrs Coutts sat up continually with the nurses at night, and his daughters assembled at the inn, under an impression that their father could not survive. About three o'clock one morning, the invalid seemed to breathe with such difficulty, that Mrs Coutts and the nurses roused all the party, with the exception of the doctor, who had retired for the night. At length it was decided that his presence was absolutely requisite, and one of the group went to request he would rise. While dressing, it would appear that he must have worked himself up to that state of excitement which is often observed in highly nervous persons whose rest is interrupted after taking opiates; for, on making his appearance, instead of going to the patient, he levelled a torrent of anger at Mrs Coutts in presence of the assembled party; he taunted her with a violation of the promise that he should never be called up at night; he referred contemptuously to her origin, her early poverty and profession; he ridiculed the infatuation of Mr Coutts in his dotage, (the poor invalid lying insensible to praise or sarcasm); in short, it is stated that there never was a more extraordinary or unprovoked outburst of rage. . . . The hasty violence of Miss Mellon's temper had been so often shewn in the course of this work, that her deep anxiety and alarm about Mr Coutts may be inferred from the fact, that she made no reply to the torrent of undeserved violence of the doctor.

But she afterwards forgave the doctor; old Coutts became convalescent, resumed his place in the Bank, and lived for several years; and the villa of Holly Lodge became the chosen resort of grandees and princes. Lucky Mrs Coutts was always superstitious, of which this is a diverting instance.

The steps at Holly Lodge, from the lawn to the hall-door, are composed of beautiful blocks of white marble, that a statuary might envy; but the highest step is disfigured by two rusty, old, broken horse-shoes fastened to it, which she and Mr Coutts (who was likewise superstitious) had found in the road, and they had caused these hideous bits of rusty iron to be nailed on the threshold to avert evil and bring good luck.

She was also a believer in dreams, and once dreamed she was tried, sentenced, and hung. Her hairdresser at the theatre interpreted the dream that she was to become a grand lady, and to hold her head very high, and perhaps attend the Court! And, twenty years afterwards, this expounder was summoned from Worthing, to dress the Duchess' hair for the drawing-room, according to her promise at the time. For this he received thirty pounds. The Duchess always loved to "elevate and surprise." She had another awful dream of encountering black lions

* She had always the pardonable whim of a much-flattered person, viz. that whatever came from her hand must be most acceptable to the invalid, and that her presence would bring comparative ease to those she loved. Thus, it is said, when the Duke of St Albans took the small-pox, during its preliminary shiverings, the Duchess thought nothing could be so efficacious as a cashmere shawl from her neck; and one after another of those hundred-guinea articles was just worn by her for a few minutes and transferred to the chilled sufferer, although she knew her own dread of infection would never allow her to resume their use.—Memoirs.

that guarded a castle full of gold and diamonds, and of escaping from them by plunging into a river. The dream-expounder, who was a coach-builder, predicted that she would encounter temptation, and suffer from malignity; but, ultimately, pass through all dangers in purity and safety, and have such good luck, that she should keep "her coach." "You shall be the builder of it then," cried Miss Mellon; and the gracious Duchess, who piqued herself on being the spoiled child of fortune, afterwards frequently declared—"My good old oracle shall build my carriages as long as I can afford to keep one."

Allusion has been already made to her dread of some sad fatality on Twelfth Day, of which she used to cite numerous instances. She was a great observer of fortunate dates, birth-days, wedding-days, and the old festival days of the calendar, with the proper appliances for each; obliging her guests, half in earnest, to taste mince-pies on New-year's Day, tansy-pudding at Easter; to wear hawthorn on May Day, holly at Christmas; in fact, such obsolete customs as would have suited Bracebridge Hall and Irving's charming descriptions.

Many of the trifling customs of prejudice which Miss Mellon observed were followed, no doubt, for the purpose of making her friends laugh—such as, the lecture she used to bestow on the fire when the impatient gas would mutter as it escaped from its black prison, which sounds had the honour of being considered the voices of evil genii uttering maledictions on the parties around the fireplace, and the injurious effects can only be conquered by outscolding the fuming coal. Another was, on eating an egg, she always made an aperture at both ends of the shell, so that the witches might not find shelter there, otherwise they were permitted to haunt with an incubus the luckless wight who had eaten the contents without taking the salutary precaution.

But there was one point of her superstitions which no argument could shake—namely, the idea that if thirteen individuals sat down at table, one of the doomed number would die within a year. So strongly was this absurd conviction impressed on Mrs Coutts' mind, that she has been often known to send invitations to intimate friends just at dinner time, that her guests might outnumber the fatal thirteen.

And, when thirteen was the inevitable number, instead of making the butler sit down, or sending for the cook to make a fourteenth, she arranged that all should rise and sit down again at once, that Death or the Devil might be perplexed in the choice of his victim. She was kind to the children of her friends, and often had them at Holly Lodge. She must, we presume, have been the legal Mrs Coutts before old Queen Charlotte, in subservience to the Regent's tastes or necessities, gave occasion to this notice.

On the occasion of her grand guests arriving, the troop of children were deposited with the Highgate schoolmistress, now a very aged woman, residing there, bed-ridden, yet acutely retaining all her faculties; and she relates how great was the wonder caused among her usual scholars by the exaggerated declaration of the new comers, that "Harriot was going to have the Prince Regent and old Queen Charlotte to eat bread and jam, and peaches, and blanched almonds, for luncheon on that day!"

Mrs Baron-Wilson tells a great many anecdotes, shewing how the shabby dress or sordid habits of the old banker, Coutts, made him frequently be taken, if not for a beggar, yet for a person in very distressed circumstances, to relieve whom was a charity; and how the wealthy man enjoyed the humour of such scenes. Mrs Baron-

Wilson has, no doubt, heard all these marvellous stories, and some of them may be true; but spontaneous charity to strangers, making no appeal to the feelings, is not constantly the habit of the benevolent English. Mr Coutts died at the great age of ninety-one, by the account of his early acquaintance, the Earl of Dundonald—at the age of eighty-seven, by the belief of his family. His children were all assembled round his death-bed. What they said or felt when it was learned that the whole of his immense fortune had been bequeathed to his wife, our author does not venture to guess.

On the anniversary of her wedding, his grateful widow always visited the bank, and pressed her lips to the spot where he habitually wrote; generally remaining alone for an hour or so in the drawing-room, and on coming forth, it is said, her eyes bore witness that her feelings had been deeply affected.

The disconsolate widow, ever studious of the decencies, did not mingle in public amusements for above a year; and it was not for two or three years afterwards that, having rejected the addresses of the Duke of York, as is hinted, and also those of the presumptuous Mr Elliston, she listened to the suit of the young Duke of St Albans.

The "progress of the attachment" between the widow and the Duke was greatly facilitated, we are told, by their "mutual admiration of Shakspeare."

One of the Duke's youthful and motherless sisters became a frequent guest at Holly Lodge, and travelled in state with the desponding widow; and a few months after the Duke came to his title, he and his sister accompanied her in a grand progress in Scotland.

They visited all the principal towns, and stayed some days with each of Mrs Coutts' friends—the Earl and Countess Breadalbane, at Taymouth Castle; the Earl and Countess Lauderdale, at Dunbar Castle; Chief Commissioner Baron Adam, (the great friend of George the Fourth,) at Blair Adam; Sir James and Lady Stuart, at Caithness; (?) Sir J. and Lady Marjoribanks; Sir John and Lady Stuart of Allanbank, (first cousins of Mr Coutts;) Mr and Lady Eleanor Balfour; and many others. But the visit of most interest was that to Abbotsford. It is thus recorded in the journal of its gifted host, "The Wizard of the North," under date November 25, 1825.

"Mrs Coutts, with the Duke of St Albans and Lady Charlotte Beauchamp, called to take leave of us. When at Abbotsford his suit thrived but coldly. She made me, I believe, her confidant in sincerity; she had refused him twice, and decidedly; he was merely on the footing of friendship. I urged it was akin to love; she allowed she might marry the Duke, only she had at present not the least inclination that way.

"Is this frank admission more favourable for the Duke than an absolute protestation against the possibility of such a marriage? I think not.

"If the Duke marries her, he ensures an immense fortune; if she marries him, she has the first rank. If he marries a woman older than himself by twenty [thirty] years, he marries a man younger in wit by twenty degrees. I do not think he will dilapidate her fortune; he seems good and gentle. I do not think she will abuse his softness of disposition—shall I say, or of—head? The disparity of ages concerns no one but themselves; so they have my consent to marry if they can get each other's. Just as this is written, enter my Lord of St Albans and Lady Charlotte, to beg I would recommend a book of sermons to Mrs Coutts. Much obliged for her good opinion; recommended Logan's. One poet should always speak for another. The mission, I suppose, was a little display on the part of good Mrs Coutts of authority over her high aristocratic suitor. I did not suspect her of turning devotée; and retract my consent as given above, unless she remains 'burly, brisk, and jolly.'

The Duchess did not need to turn devotée; she was always eminently pious. The first day on which, as a peeress of the realm, she was to attend the opening of Parliament, so occupied had she been all the morning with the pomps and vanities of the toilette, and other matters of ducal state etiquette, that she had forgotten to say her prayers. Just when stepping into the carriage, the tender-conscienced Duchess remembered the sin of omission—dismissed the carriages—returned into her house—laid aside her diamonds and satins—and did penance, or made amends to heaven for some hours, in plain gingham! She, so favoured of heaven, to forget the gratitude she owed in return! It must have been quite a scene. Can there be any question of the enlightened Christianity and moral principles of so pious and self-denying a Duchess; who, moreover, ranked the then Bishop of Derry and his lady among her dear friends?

The skittish widow was as capricious, and hesitated as much about accepting the addresses of her noble and youthful suitor, as she had done about marrying her octogenarian "patron." First, the Duke was sentenced to a year's probation, which trial, we presume, he had stood with courage and firmness; and then she accepted and then refused, and then again repented her stern refusal; and, as there was this time no convenient Mr Raymond, sent a messenger post-haste after the groom, who carried her cruel missive, and who luckily—the Duchess was always lucky—overtook him.

The world would say that "she had tried for a Duke and failed!" for who would credit the folly she had just committed? On regaining the ungraceful answer, she wrote another from the natural dictates of her first intention. This acceptance of his offer brought the Duke to Holly Lodge,

No time was now to be lost; the Duke behaved nobly "respecting settlements," leaving all to the generosity of the bride; and Mrs Baron-Wilson is of the belief that those who imagine that the Duke married solely from mercenary motives are greatly mistaken. It is certainly greatly to his honour that she did not make him her heir. The Duchess' wedding-gift to her young lord was thirty thousand pounds! or about a thousand for each year she was older than her husband. We do not notice here, though we recollect seeing in the newspapers at the time, that the happy pair claimed and obtained the Dunmow Flitch at the end of their first year of wedded felicity.

The magnificent doings of the Duchess of St Albans in London, Brighton, Cheltenham, &c. &c., are they not blazoned in Sunday newspapers, and immortalised in fashionable magazines? so we leave them in their glory. To the greatest riches, she had now added the highest rank; but the thing did not work well. The lucky woman never seems to have been the happy woman. Her life would appear to have been a series of heart-burnings, bravado, and mortification. She cut Cheltenham in a rage. She discarded ungrateful Brighton in disgust; nor, though the public authorities entreated almost, on their official knees, that she would come back and shine upon their eclipsed town, could she be moved to relent.

We may safely leave the moral of this lucky woman's story to the dispassionate reflection of the reader. We trust that, instead of indulging in malignant and envious feelings of her great good fortune, readers will see that there was much to pity in her life, and little to envy. Her only substantial distinction was enormous wealth, and it failed to acquire for her either love, reverence, esteem, or true enjoyment. And does her conduct merit no blame? When she formed the scheme of securing Old Coutts, she had not even the poor actress's plea of poverty to palliate disreputable artifices and sordid ambition. She was already in good and improving circumstances—rich for Harriot Mellon, and at this time honourably so. From the first hour of that connexion, every step was retrograde from respectability and from happiness. We are not going to debate the exact nature of the connexion; it is enough that the world will ever believe that it was quite as pure and platonic as suited Mr Coutts' principles and tastes, and neither more nor less so.

A pitiable drudge in the galling harness of fashion, the poor Duchess became at last; striving, with failing health and sinking spirits, against the heavy load; and bitterly feeling that all was vanity and vexation of spirit! A gentleman at Brighton, who seems grateful and well-disposed to her, relates a good deal about her private life in her latter years.

From the crowd and heat of those festivities, both of which were very apt to be oppressive, her Grace would sometimes seek a respite by taking me aside, and chatting about olden times, green-room jokes, popular actors, plays, and play-writers; her beaming features and melodious laugh attesting the delight she took in these reminiscences.

Twice, in instances of this nature, and nearly in the same words, has her Grace exclaimed—"Ah, those were pleasant days!—those were pleasant days! Few persons have seen so much of the various aspects—I may say of the two extremes of life—as myself; and few persons, therefore, can be better judges of the difference between great poverty and great wealth; but, after all, this does not, by any means, constitute the chief and most important distinction between the high and low states. No; the signal, the striking contrast is not in the external circumstances, but in the totally opposite minds of the two classes, as to their respective enjoyment of existence. The society in which I formerly moved was all cheerfulness—all high spirits—all fun, frolic, and vivacity; they cared for nothing, thought of nothing, beyond the pleasures of the present hour, and to those they gave themselves up with the keenest relish. Look at the circles in which I now move; can anything be more 'weary, stale, flat, and unprofitable,' than their whole course of life? Why, one might as well be in the treadmill, as toiling in the stupid monotonous round of what they call pleasure, but which is, in fact, very cheerless and heavy work. Pleasure, indeed! when all merriment, all hilarity, all indulgence of our natural emotions, if they be of a joyous nature, is declared to be vulgar."

Sometimes she was obliged to retire at a very early neur, or not appear at all, being confined by indisposition to her couch in her own room, while the whole mansion, echoing to the sound of bands of music, and the merriment of the dancing crowd, was at the same time pervaded by the fumes of the preparing banquet; accompaniments to which no other invalid would have willingly exposed herself for the sake of gratifying her acquaintance.

The gratification of her vanity had now become a habit, and her passion for eclat might be at least equally interested with the desire to oblige. The Duchess of St Albans, when Dr Brewster, one evening, sent his pretty toy, the kaleidoscope, to the universal patroness of the arts and sciences, related an anecdote of her childhood. The shrewd girl had been wont to exhibit some such thing to her childish companions, at the rate of a couple of pins for a peep; with which pins she forthwith hastened to an old woman to exchange them for lolly-pops. The story is illustrative of her life of restless, unsatisfying grandeur; with this material difference, that the lolly-pops of fashion and luxury, bought with her cleverly acquired hoards, were no longer sweet to the taste, though the appetite for them had not abated.

Her biographer must pardon us for saying that she kept up her affectations of sentiment to the last, or that they had become part of her nature. Mr Coutts, who, in his dotage, was as romantic, superstitious, and sentimental as herself, or as she chose to make him, had on his death-bed promised to revisit her as a little singing bird—of all the poetical incarnations of connubial love. She was always looking out for him from her boudoir window in Stratton Street; and if a bird (ten to a hundred a sparrow) did enter her room, tempted by the offered food, the artless Duchess “would, for the remainder of the morning, be as happy as a child whose playmate had returned.” Now, some hard-natured persons may be tempted, Mrs Baron-Wilson fears, to believe that “this is all very well acted;” but no—“a deeper insight into her character always brought the conviction, that at all times there was not a sufficiency of acting in her artless nature even to procure from the world common justice, much less a false reputation for sentiment.” This passes! Our mouths are shut, and we take leave of our author in the hope that, before she writes another biography, with better and fuller materials, she may also have seriously inquired, in what good fortune in life should really be held to consist. Mrs Siddons, with splendid genius in her profession, was an instance of true good fortune; for she was beloved and respected for her virtues. Mrs Inchbald, a woman of much higher genius, industrious, frugal, charitable, unselfish, devoted to her relatives, maintaining her integrity in the face of great temptation, we also consider an eminent instance of true good fortune. From her obscure lodging, blessed with competence, and even with moderate wealth, honourably acquired, she could afford to look serenely down and pity the rich banker’s favourite, or the uneasy Duchess driving to Court in her blazing equipage. No, no, we are well content to take Mrs Coutts as she was, with all her faults and failings, “burly, brisk, and jolly:” but we repudiate the artificial puffed-up personage presented to us in these volumes. This may be Mrs Coutts’ funeral sermon, but it is not her memoirs. And the simple truth would have made a much more popular and interesting book.

The will of this celebrated lady was quite in keeping with her character. She seems to have regularly kept an account of the large sums she generously disbursed among Mr Coutts’ daughters during her life, which she was in the habit of shewing to her friends and visiters. Instead of devoting any part of the great wealth, of which she had obtained the command, to public objects, or to some purpose of humanity; instead of even dividing it fairly and judiciously among the numerous descendants of Mr Coutts, she chose, like the dying old man in St Leon, to transmit her perilous gift to one young lady, who, we should hope, may have the virtue to feel humbled at being preferred, by the mere caprice of this vulgar woman, to all her own family, and the other grandchildren of Mr Coutts. This is the only way in which enlightened morality and common sense must regard the extraordinary will, by which the Duchess must have intended to create, with an enormously rich heiress, a prodigious posthumous sensation.

Let us conclude by inquiring, if there be any one wise or feeling woman, who can envy her prosperity; or, looking to her whole life, any one man of honour and sense who would calmly desire for his daughter or his sister the brilliant lot of the unfathered beggar-child, and poor strolling actress, who died at last the richest woman in England, and the most noble Duchess of St Albans?

TO DR RAFFLES, WITH MY AUTOGRAPH:

WHAT IS RELIGION? “Speak the truth in love:”
Doubting, inquire—nor dictate, till thou prove:
Reject no good: Mend, if thou canst, thy lot:
Enjoy thy own—exceed not, trespass not:
Pity the scornors of earth’s meanest thing:
If wrong’d, forgive—that hate may lose his sting:
Think, speak, work, yet bestow! or wisely keep:
So live, that thou may’st smile, and no one weep.

Like woodblines, cluster’d o’er the linnet’s nest,
Or birds, that sing because they love, be blest;
And bless, like rivers, never asking why,
Or soft-voiced showers, to which cool’d wooda reply,
When cloudy wings are wide in heaven display’d,
And blessings brighten o’er the freshen’d sod,
Till earth is like the countenance of God.
This is Religion! Saith the Bard of Trade.

EDMUND ELLIOTT.

THE ECCLESIASTICAL COURTS.

' My Lords, we must reform these consistory laws,
Whose great defame above the heaven blaws.
I knew a man in sowing for a cow,
Ere he had done he spent full half a bow :
So that the King's honour we may advance
We will conclude as they have done in France ;
*Let spiritual matters pass to spiritualitie,
And temporal matters unto temporalitie.*"

SIR DAVID LINDSAY.

ONE of the most odious features of the ecclesiastical system of England and Ireland, is presented in what, by perversion of language, are called spiritual or ecclesiastical courts. Extensive jurisdiction is exercised by these tribunals in every diocese, and in many archdeaconries, parishes, and manors ; and this jurisdiction affects causes of a civil and a temporal nature ; involving our properties and rights and gives an enormous power into the hands of men, more than any others, liable to abuse it, which may, at the caprice of an individual, be used most unfavourably to civil and religious liberty. So far as civil cases are concerned, it is found that their proceedings are expensive, tedious, and bungling. We find courts with ignorant judges and unqualified practitioners, with power to make them formidable, and knowledge enough to make them mischievous—engines of local tyranny, ready to pinch and oppress those who have the unpardonable effrontery to think for themselves, and resist the encroachments of the church establishment.

Why is not the land purged of these local abominations? Why should the property of the country be placed in priestly custody? Why is this system tolerated, that tramples on the rights of conscience, and strangles civil and religious liberty in detail? We put these questions for the serious attention of the country. These ecclesiastical courts are held by the People in general abhorrence ; they have been tried, convicted, and sentenced by royal commission ; they have been branded with a condemnatory resolution of the House of Commons ; denounced by the highest ecclesiastical law authorities in England ; yet here we are, at the close of the session of 1839—seven weary years and more since the report of the ecclesiastical commissioners was laid on the table of the House of Commons—and the ecclesiastical courts are yet blistering the patient population. It will perhaps be suggested that, shamed by scrutiny, and awed by the power of Parliament, they have, in later years, conducted themselves with meekness, and have not provoked fresh chastisement. But it is not so. We are too well acquainted with the vices essential to the system to fall into the error of supposing, that the conduct of its administrators, however wary, could deprive it of its sting—"make wrong right, or consecrate a crime." And it is to be borne in mind, that an evil so extensive in its ramifications is not to be judged of by the number of positive and flagrant cases of oppression detected by the public eye, but by the silent influence of its operation—the heart-burning and the wrong inflicted and created in these secluded localities of the country. Yet the conduct of these courts has not been equivocal. They have defied public opinion ; and, supposing themselves secure by reason of the incomprehensible listlessness of their victims, have assumed an arrogance of bearing, and exhibited a spirit of domination and intolerance, worthy of the palmiest days of their power. True, our noses cannot be slit, nor our ears be cut off, for writing against the divine right of prelacy, as in the days of that worthy ecclesiastic, Laud ; and Dr Wardlaw can speak his mind as to apostolical succession without the fear of the cat-o'-nine-tails, the pillory, or the stocks. But cases of oppression and hardship have, during the last twelve months, transpired, which challenge us fairly to grapple with the evils of the system.

The Protestant society for the protection of civil and religious liberty, in their address of February last, state that, out of sixty-two cases in which application had been made to that body for assistance, several were cases of oppression in ecclesiastical courts in various parts of the country. And who forgets the case of Widow Woolfrey? This poor woman resided in the parish of Carisbrooke, in the Isle of Wight, and, in memory of her deceased husband, placed a tomb or head-stone in the parish churchyard, above his ashes, on which, according to the custom of persons of the Roman Catholic persuasion—to which they both belonged—the widow had graven the words, "Pray for the soul of J. Woolfrey," and beneath them, from the book of Maccabees, "It is a holy and wholesome thought to pray for the dead." Shakspeare, who with a happy alchemy, extracted good from everything, saw "books in the running brooks," and discovered "sermons in stones ;" so did the Rev. John Breeks, vicar of Carisbrooke. The tomb-stone preached flat heresy, and he cited the widow into the diocesan court of Winchester ; from whence, by letters of request from the Vicar-General on the voluntary promotion of Mr Breeks (who had no regard for the pelliccoat,) the case was carried to the Arches court in London. On the 19th of November the case was decided ; and the judge, Sir Herbert Jenner, declared, that praying for the dead was not prohibited by the articles of the Established Church, and decided that the vicar could not punish the widow.

In March last, a man named Israel Brown, a poor cordwainer of Broadway in Worcestershire, with a wife and six children depending on his daily labour for support, was cited before the consistorial court, to answer the demand of 3s. for Easter offerings. It appeared that he had not been called on to pay those "offerings," for three years previously; in consequence of which he refused payment. And what does his spiritual pastor, who fancies that he has a good claim to be a successor of Peter and Paul? He drags Israel Brown to the spiritual court; and Israel was not freed from the hands of priest and proctor, till payment of THREE GUINEAS was made. This may be law in Worcestershire; nay, it may be just, according to ecclesiastical law; but Christian! believer in a Gospel of mercy, loving kindness, and compassion to the poor, do you not call the vile system that sanctions this act of remorseless rigour, nominally and professedly for the good and support of RELIGION, a blot upon the Christian name, and a reproach to the cross? We are perfectly aware that, in the case of Carthew v. Edwards, T. 1748, it was decreed, by the Court of Exchequer, that Easter offerings, or oblations and obventions as they are also styled, were due the plaintiff of common right, after the rate of 2d. a-head for every person in the defendant's family of sixteen years of age and upward; and we do not charge the Vicar of Broadway with violating the law: like Shylock, he can point to the bond; but we remind him that a book with which he ought to be familiar, declares:—"He that giveth to the poor shall not lack; but he that hideth his face shall have many a curse."

A third case which excited a general feeling of disgust and indignation, was that of David Jones, a weaver at Llanon in Wales, who was cast into prison at the suit of the Rev. Ebenezer Morris. Jones was a Unitarian; and, in 1837, was elected church-warden of his parish. After his appointment he called a vestry to make a church-rate; but, at the meeting, an adjournment was moved and carried. On the 25th May, 1838, he received, from the vicar, a notice, requiring him to provide bread and wine for the sacrament. Jones, on the 11th of June, replied that he had no funds out of which to procure them, and was too poor to provide them at his own cost. The man was cited before the ecclesiastical court—was pronounced contumacious—and by a process issued by the court of Queen's Bench, was cast into Carmarthen Jail! Churchmen can see no hardship in this—no scandal—no outrage on freedom—no violation of civil and religious liberty!! Let it be granted that Mr Ebenezer Morris did no more than "the law" allowed him to do; cannot the man see that such a transaction, on the face of it, is a sarcasm on religion; that it leads people to ask in what page of the new Testament it is warranted, and renders the Church offensive to the nostrils of the country? Yet doctors differ as to the legality of the proceeding. Dr Adame, one of the most eminent civilians in England, gave it as his opinion, as Jones had called a vestry, which vestry had refused a rate, "that the pronement's case was untenable, and his proceeding unwarrantable;" and he added, "unless the case is mismanaged on behalf of the defendant, the final issue must, I think, be the dismissal of the defendant with his full costs." Dr Haggard, another conspicuous ecclesiastical advocate, gave a similar opinion. He said, "The proceeding is but little calculated to assist the question of diocesan jurisdiction, and will, in my opinion, on an appeal, make but a very sorry figure." Sir J. Lushington, also one profoundly conversant with canonical law, declared it as his belief, that if the proceeding had been commenced in one of the superior courts, it would at once have been rejected.

Well, from this case, we turn to one still more arbitrary. Mr James, a farmer, of the Independent denomination, was, in 1837, elected church-warden of the parish of Llanelly. Mr James did not absent himself from his usual place of worship; and the result was, that, at the expiration of his term of office, he was cited before the ecclesiastical court of St David's, by the above-named Rev. E. Morris, who luckily happens to be vicar of both places, on the charge of having absented himself for several Sundays from Church! It is to be noted too, that the elections of 1837 took place at this time, and that Mr James voted for the Liberal candidate, Sir J. Williams, while the vicar was a conspicuous partisan of the Tory. How far this fact influenced the conduct of Ebenezer—this Welsh help-stone of Church and State—is a matter of conjecture. Mr James was cited. And who sat in judgment upon him? The Rev. J. O. Williams, a surrogate, who is avowedly the editor or chief contributor to a Carmarthen Tory paper—a parson-judge and a partisan. Mr James was condemned for contumacy; and a process having, as previously, been issued by the court of Queen's Bench; in the face of England, in the face of Europe, in the face of a Protestant people boasting their enlightenment, toleration, and justice, a man was cast into prison FOR NOT ATTENDING WORSHIP IN THE LAW CHURCH. Impious and audacious usurpation! Abominable despotism! And are these things, and is a system which produces them, to be borne by a free People? We tell the ecclesiastical marauders, that this black fabric shall be dashed down and ground to powder, and scattered to the four winds of heaven. It cannot be tolerated by free-men and Christians. It was the creation of priestcraft, and is now the fortress of imposture, corruption, and tyranny. Without entering at length into the historical origin of courts ecclesiastical, we may observe that the British ecclesiastical laws have, for the most part, been derived from that system of canonical law which prevailed, during the dark ages, in nearly every country in Europe; and that, before the Conquest, these courts exercised jurisdiction in England. The pontifical law, Lord Stair observes, in his work on the law of Scotland, "extended to all persons and things belonging to the Romish Church, and separate from the laity; to all things relating to pious uses; to the guardianship of orphans; the wills of defuncts; and matters of marriage and divorce ; all of which were exempted from the civil authority of the sovereigns who were devoted to the see of Rome." Our present business is not, however, with historical investigation, but with an exhibition of these courts now in operation ; their numbers, their jurisdiction, and their constitution. The ordinary ecclesiastical courts, we are informed by the ecclesiastical commission of 1832, are—the provincial courts, being in the province of Canterbury, the court of Arches or the supreme court of appeal,* the prerogative or testamentary court, and the court of peculiars ; and, in the province of York, the prerogative or testamentary court, and the chancery court: the diocesan courts, being the consistorial court of every diocese exercising general jurisdiction ; the court or courts of one or more commissaries, appointed by the bishop, in certain dioceses, to exercise general jurisdiction within the prescribed limits ; and the court or courts of one or more archdeacons, or their officials, exercising general or limited jurisdiction, according to the term of their patents, or to local custom. There are also peculiars of various descriptions in most dioceses, and in some they are very numerous—royal, archiepiscopal, episcopal, decanal, sub-decanal, prebendal, rectorial, vicarial ; and there are also some manorial courts ! Now who can deny that John Bull is a priest-ridden man ? In England and Wales there are no less than THREE HUNDRED AND SEVENTY-TWO of these engines of despotism. These courts are diffused all over the country, like poisoned streams, irrigating the whole face of the land. In the diocese of Bath and Wells, there are twenty-seven of these sentinels over the Establishment, so many restraints upon liberty of conscience ; in Lichfield, thirty-eight ; in Lincoln, forty-two ; in Winchester, forty-nine ; and, not to enumerate more, in York, fifty-eight ! The jurisdiction of these courts comprehends testamentary causes ; matrimonial causes for separation, and for nullity of marriage ; suits for tithes, church-rates, seats, and faculties ; criminal suits pro salute animæ, embracing offences committed by the clergy themselves—such as, neglect of duty, immoral conduct, advancing doctrines not conformable to the articles of the church, suffering dilapidations, and the like ; also by laymen—such as, brawling, laying violent hands, and other such irreverent conduct in the church or churchyard, violating churchyards, neglecting to repair ecclesiastical buildings, incest, incontinence, defamation, &c. With respect to the 300 courts peculiar, the report of the commission bears witness :—"The jurisdiction to be exercised in these different courts is not defined by any general law. It is often extremely difficult to ascertain over what description of causes the jurisdiction of any particular court operates ; and much inconvenience results from this uncertainty."

There is something monstrously absurd in the idea of placing in the hands of men whose office relates to eternity and the soul, power over property belonging to the body in this temporal state of existence. No man, we dare hazard the assertion, can offer one reason for the existence of such an anomaly as this ; except unfaithfulness to ministerial trust, and a grasping and aggrandizing spirit of ambition, which is fatal alike to civil liberty and to pure and undefiled religion. "Clerical peers and clerical legislators," William Howitt justly says, "are anomalous enough : but clerical taxers of orphans, and clerical guardians of testamentary documents, are still more anomalous." And then we have clerical judges, in questions affecting property. Ezra Jones leaves John Brown, the medical man who attended him in his last illness, and William Robinson who read the news, and told him the gossip of the town, the bulk of his property—say £8,000, while Thomas Jones, his brother's son, is alive, and respectable in his conduct. The testator's sanity is questioned ; the validity of the will is disputed ; who is to be judge in the case ?—A parson ; unless, indeed, the bishop's commissary should preside in court, as sometimes, in some courts, he does. There are many reasons why a clergyman should not be a judge in such cases, while we have never seen a reason why he should exercise judicial functions.

* The report omits to state that there is no appeal from the provincial court of York, except to the Privy Council.

I. It is inconsistent with the character of a minister of the Gospel. It is recorded by St Luke, chap. xii., that when one of the company said to Christ, "Master, speak to my brother, that he divide the inheritance with me." The Saviour replied, "Man, who made me a judge or a divider over you ?" Yet now we see the servant greater than his lord ; claiming literally to be both a "judge" and a "divider."

II. A clergyman is not fitted by education for the office of a judge. Knowledge of the Old and New Testaments does not necessarily qualify a man to sit in judgment upon the last will and testament of John A'Noakes or John A'Styles. What would "the Church" say if a linen-draper were to make himself a pair of lawn sleeves, and take his seat on the bishops' bench ? What would be said, if a sailor or a grazier were to commence the practice of medicine, or a soldier to set up as chirurgeon ? if a butcher or a cutler were to push the Lord-Chief-Justice from his stool ; or if a hatter were to put on the black cap, and assume the execution of the law ? Would not the whole world exclaim—Every man to his proper station—ne sutor ultra crepidam ? It is equally absurd to see a man fresh from study upon election, predestination, original sin, prophecy, sprinkling or immersion, the Greek article and the millennial state, judging of evidence, fact, and law ; especially where a case may depend upon the circumstance, whether a name begins on the parchment with a B or an H. The incompetent cry of the clergy as judges is fully established by the report of the ecclesiastical commission.

III. A clergyman is liable to be affected by undue influence. Squire William is appellant in a will cause. This squire is the patron of a half dozen good livings. He has presented the judge's nephew, or has a vacancy for his son; or, perhaps something worth while for the judge himself! A parson always looks for promotion; and here he is a judge adjudicating in cases of property, where those who have promotion in their hands are parties concerned.

IV. The clergy are unfitted by sectarian feeling from being judges. A sum of money is left for a religious purpose to a Wesleyan, Unitarian, Baptist, Roman Catholic, or Independent. The case comes to trial: Can a parson possibly be an unbiassed judge? Or again, a man leaves £5 per annum to the church-wardens of St Michael's, to be expended in bread for the poor. A dissenter or Catholic, after worshipping at his own place, solicits a share. He is refused because he does not attend church. Who is to try this case? Shame, where is thy blush—a parson!

V. The jurisdiction exercised by these mongrel judges tends to uphold a supremacy over other ministers of religion, which is based upon falsehood and injustice.

And if a cleric be an unfit judge, in questions affecting property, how much more unfit is he in criminal cases! He is a judge unaided or uncontrolled by a jury; his power is defined by no certain law: he sits, as it were, an absolute monarch in his petty court. In the name of common sense and justice, if ecclesiastical offences are to be punished, let us have a properly constituted tribunal, and let Englishmen be found guilty by a jury of their countrymen before they are cast into jail. A man tried, found guilty, sentenced and imprisoned, without a trial by his peers! this is a thing so scandalous and objectionable, that it is a wonder that these ecclesiastical inquisitions should be permitted to exist for a day. Further, the judge is directly and positively interested in the cases in which he so adjudicates. His own power, and privileges, and interest, are concerned in nearly every question which comes before him. The criminal is a delinquent against the clerical order; and the cause of the minutest particle of that order is the cause of the whole; nay, if a woman, getting "churched,"* forgets the "dues" of the sexton, it is an insult to the altar! Now, if it be true that a man who conducts his own case has, as the adage goes, a fool for his client, must not the man who tries a cause in which he is concerned, have a knave for the judge?

We have seen, in the instances of Mr Jones and Mr James, exhibitions of the power which those courts have over church-wardens; and if we associate this power with the laws which regulate the election and duties of these parish officers, of which the public, generally speaking, are not at all aware, we shall see the injustice of the system in, perhaps, a still stronger light. The duties of a church-warden are numerous:

* A ceremonial of purification by which Mother Church comes at a half-crown from every church mother who has given birth to a child, independent of baptismal fees!

Every letter in the alphabet, from alms to visitation, are embraced in the catalogue; and for neglect or violation of them, or any one of them, he is liable to be cited before the spiritual court. Church-wardens are bound by law to present to the ordinary, at the visitations, all such persons as do not come to the parish church, (Canon 90; 5 and 6 Edward VI., c. 1; Eliz. c. 2; 2 James I. c. 1,) or do not frequent some other place of assembly for religious worship, tolerated by the act of toleration, (1 Will. and Mary, c. 18;) and they are required not only to observe who are absent from church, but also to see and take care that all persons thereto, do, in the time of divine service and sermon, behave themselves orderly, soberly, and reverently—kneeling at the prayers, standing at the belief, and sitting or standing quietly and attentively at the reading of the Scriptures and the preaching of God's Word, (Can. 18, iii.,) that none walk, or talk, or make a noise in the church, to disturb duty which is performing there, Ibid; that none sit there with their hats on, (except they have some infirmity, and then with a cap,) or in any other indecent or irreverent manner. (1 Eliz. c. 2, 0, 14; Can. 18;) that none contend or quarrel about place, or on any other occasion make a broil or brawling there, (5 and 6 Edw. VI., c. 4;) that no idle person alide in the church-porch or churchyard during divine service or sermon, but that he or she either comes or departs, (Can. 19.) And then fidgetty little boys who slip out of church upon sundry pretences, are to be spied out, and caught, and, if necessary, put into the parochial prison; for the church-warden is

"A potent monarch, call'd the constable,
That does command a citadel call'd the Stocks."

Again, it is his duty to see that no excommunicate person comes into the church. (Can. 19.)! Now, to neglect these duties is to render yourself liable to imprisonment by the process of the ecclesiastical court; for it is to be noted that in no instance whatever can the property of an individual be attached by the authority of these courts, or by the assistance of any other tribunal.* When we state, therefore, that the parish-priest has the power of appointing annually one church-warden,† and can influence generally the election of the second; and, in addition to this, that if a person, properly elected to the office, refuses to take the prescribed oath,‡ he can be excommunicated;* ("Gibson's Code," 194.) it is apparent that the clergyman has it in his power to compel the attendance of any individual at

* See Report of Eccl. Com. p. 67.

† By the canons of the Church, (Canons, 89 and 90.) church-wardens are chosen by the joint consent of the minister and parishioners; but by custom or prescription—that is, prior to the first year of Richard I., anno 1189, or, in legal phraseology, "time which is beyond the memory of man," the minister may choose one and the parishioners the other.

‡ The oath is as follows:—"You shall swear truly and faithfully to execute the office of church-warden within your parish, and according to the best of your skill and knowledge, present such things and persons as to your knowledge are presentable by the laws ecclesiastical of this realm. So help you God and the contents of this book."

his church on pain of imprisonment! The law amounts to this: If a man is in the habit of attending a Dissenting Chapel, the parson makes him church-warden, and he is compelled to attend the parson's ministry or go to jail! It is difficult to speak with patience of things so vile as these; more difficult when we are told that they are useful and necessary for the maintenance of religion.

The jurisdiction of these courts affecting suits for defamation, also operates most mischievously. It gives them power and consequence, and affords litigious and spiteful persons an opportunity of readily gratifying their vindictive feelings; but, considering the constitution of the courts, it must at once be confessed, that this jurisdiction is unnecessary, inadequate, and unsuited for the ends of justice. The commissioners express the opinion, "that the benefit which may sometimes arise from this mode of correcting the offence in question, and its subsequent prevention, is not commensurate with the evils resulting from the present exercise of this jurisdiction; and, therefore, we recommend that the cognizance of such cases should be wholly withdrawn from ecclesiastical courts." Suits for defamation are unfrequent in the superior courts; but they often come before the diocesan and minor courts: from the first of January 1827, to the end of 1829, there were twenty-one cases in the court of Carlisle; and, during the same period, sixty cases in the consistory court of Chester.

Let us now pause, and request the public to contemplate this vast system of wrong. Let them look at men ignorant of law, sitting as judges of law; men who have sworn to devote themselves to the concerns of the soul and the hereafter, meddling with things temporal: let them, again, see clergy sitting in judgment on cases where their feelings, their interests, and their privileges are involved: let them see the shameful and unjust things that are done, under colour of law, in violation of civil and religious freedom, in these courts; all to support the power and the supremacy of a State priesthood, and to bind them firmly, by aid of the secular arm, on the necks of the People; let it be recollected that there are 372 of these courts in England and Wales; and then let men imagine the fantastic tricks played in the villages and small towns by these inquisitions of the nineteenth century. Be it further remembered, that the lord of a manor can appoint, remove, or suspend a judge on his own manor—which judge has extensive jurisdiction; that there is no TRIAL BY JURY in any of these tribunals; that the men who practise law therein are often entirely ignorant of that mystery. Let these things be examined into, and we defy any man not to feel ashamed that such an institution as that from whence they arise, should be permitted to disgrace this kingdom.

It is true that the practitioners in these courts are generally described as incompetent and unskilful.* But we must not overstate our case. All proctors are not necessarily sharks and dunces; nor is every surrogate a runagate. The proctor, when fingering the fees, may use the words of Falstaff, accused of cutting purses—"Tis my vocation, Hal, and a man may labour honestly in his vocation;" and to say that a cleric is a bad judge in his own case, does not insinuate that he could not perform his duty at the dinner-table, in the ball-room, or the pulpit. Generally speaking, the proctor is an ill-used creature. It is to be recollected in his favour, that he occupies a position analogous to that of camp-followers, who never kill with their own hands, but perform the duty of rifling the bodies prepared for them by the troops, and giving them decent burial. A proctor never imprisons a man: he only makes out a bill of costs; and if one does not pay it he must go to prison. Indeed, we could never fathom the motives of the managers of the Vagrant Office in Canterbury, who put up the sly notice—"All travellers relieved here, except rogues and proctors!" The proctors in the provincial courts too, it is only fair to say, are qualified by a course of study in canonical law, and preliminary exercises in ecclesiastical gunnery, although that study and the examination are objectionable; nor do we assert that we never saw one of the proctor species smoke his pipe, take his beverage, walk, talk, and bear an amiable character like any proper man, strange as the notion may be of an amiable proctor—

"Dove-feathered raven! wolfish-ravener lamb!"

In the foregoing remarks we have passed over the delays and expenses of these courts, and we have dismissed other topics affecting their jurisdiction. We desired to avoid wearying the reader with details which may be considered tedious; and we refer inquirers on the question to the Report of the Commission, and the valuable body of evidence forming its appendix. We have said enough, however, to prove the necessity of immediately carrying out the recommendation of the Commissioners,† and the resolution of the House of Commons, on the 25th of April last, both amounting to this—that all the diocesan, peculiar, and minor courts should forthwith be ABOLISHED; and, after that, of materially altering the constitution of the two provincial tribunals.

If the Bishop of Exeter demands, What then becomes of "Church discipline?" we reply, in the words of a judicious writer on church reform, "we desire that civil matters may be brought before civil tribunals, criminal cases before temporal judges, and spiritual delinquencies left to the decision of the religious bodies to which the offenders may belong."

* See Report, page 23.

† The Archbishop of Canterbury and the Bishop of London being among the number.

* Excommunication is no joke even yet. By an Act of 53 Geo. III. c. 127, in all cases where excommunication is pronounced as part of the sentence, the ecclesiastical court is empowered to assign any term of imprisonment not exceeding six months, all other consequences of excommunication being taken away, and the imprisonment to be enforced by certifying the sentence to the Court of Chancery.

THE REBEL CHIEF.

A SCENE IN THE WICKLOW MOUNTAINS, 1803.

"WELL, sir, are you still disposed to proceed on the secret service which you volunteered?"

(This question was put by the late Colonel A——, adjutant-general in Ireland at the period above stated, to a lieutenant of the ——th regiment, then on Dublin duty, who attended for the great man's orders.)

"I am ready, sir, at any moment, to proceed on my hazardous mission," respectfully answered the lieutenant; "but, considering the risks of such a service, I trust it may not be deemed unreasonable on me to request some pledge or guarantee from the Government, for the fulfilment of the terms on which I venture to undertake it—namely, promotion, and the proclaimed reward, for the death or apprehension of the Rebel Chief; or, in the event of loss of life, a competent provision for my family."

The cold and cautious A—— attempted to parry off any direct pledge on the part of Government, not from any sinister views, but solely from official jealousy, which fired at the base idea of an inferior officer presuming to dictate terms. He suggested to the subaltern, "whether he did not risk the favour of Government by doubting the strict performance of any promise made by it?"

"With the utmost deference, colonel," replied the subaltern, "to you and the Government, I beg to refer to the case of the officer who lost his life on a similar service some months back, on the failure of his attempt, but without the slightest reproach on his courage or discretion; and whose widow is now dependent on the precarious charity of the benevolent—all parties in the State shifting the blame from themselves. The Treasury required the vice-regal order to pay the compensation promised:—the Lord Lieutenant, humanely disposed to yield, referred the claim for the recommendation of the Commander of the Forces; but that distinguished officer (who has assumed the command since the transaction occurred, and knows not the critical circumstances under which the deceased officer undertook this dangerous service) sets his face against the claim altogether, as offering a precedent for officers stipulating for personal reward for services which it is only their duty to perform. Thus, for a point of etiquette between public departments, the compensation to this hour remains in arrear. With this picture before me, sir, I trust you will deem me excusable in requiring some specific pledge, if merely an official letter, which would leave my mind at ease with respect to my family, whatever fate awaited me."

A frown on the brow of the man of office, and a cold bow of dismissal, with orders to await further instructions, sent the poor subaltern away in no very enviable mood.

Of all public functionaries, your high military chiefs are surely the most intractable and cold-hearted; they seem to feel as if their dignity would be compromised, should they, for a moment, descend to the level of common sense and kindness. It would really appear as if those heads of department had been chosen for those unamiable qualities alone, to fill stations, abroad and at home, where the nicest spirit of discrimination, the most humane and liberal consideration for the feelings and remonstrances of all those (particularly of inferior rank) who claim their protection and justice, should form their chief qualifications for office. It would be an invidious and ungrateful task to refer to particular instances within our own times; but a glance at the list of those high functionaries, (colonial and domestic.) for the last half century, would establish the fact. The inferior officer would be for ever ruined in his profession, who should convict his superior of oppression or injustice. The lecture just read to an adjutant-general by a poor lieutenant of the line, about to proceed on a perilous and yet inglorious enterprise, curled the blood of the man of power, with momentary hatred of the humble subaltern. And this was A——, a brave and honourable soldier, who at Vimeira signalized his valour, and who perished, on the retreat to Corunna in 1809, amidst the general regret of his gallant companions in arms! Surely there must be some hidden curse in office, which withers and dries up the nobler fountains of the heart, or freezes them into a cold forgetfulness of the fine and generous feelings of our nature! an opinion which, of course, will be denounced by the officials of all ranks; but let that pass; so long as man is the painter, the lion will be drawn as prostrate at his feet.

The capture or death of Holt, the Rebel Chief of the Wicklow Mountains, had long been an object of deep anxiety with the Irish Government. This extraordinary man, of whom little was previously known, save that he had been a farmer in comfortable circumstances, took the field in 1798, as chief of a formidable body of rebels; over whom he held a separate and uncontrolled command. Participating in the short-lived triumphs which the early successes of the insurgent army afforded, he subsequently shared in its defeat; but, being a man of uncommon vigour of body, great mental resources, and a master of that kind of vulgar oratory and persuasive address which is so effectual with the Irish, he succeeded in attaching to his green standard, under all his reverses, a tolerably large force of those desperate outlaws—the scattered remnants of the late formidable rebel army. With these he withdrew, at the close of the above year, to the fastnesses of the Wicklow Mountains, the wild scene of his nativity; with every glen and valley of which he had been familiarized from infancy. Within the mazes of this untravelled region, Holt found means to elude all the efforts of military skill and enterprise, to seize him by force or ensnare him by stratagem. The utmost ingenuity was exercised to mislead and harass the King's troops in this mountain warfare. The rapidity of the rebel's movements, and his apparent ubiquity, baffled all the plans of the professional soldier: military science was put to shame by the superior tactics of the mountain chieftain. In this manner he held all the powers of Government at defiance for upwards of four years.

On the breaking out of the ill-concerted and feeble insurrection of 1803, Holt once more descended from the mountains, in all his former terrors, to join a large body of rebels from the adjacent counties of Kildare, Wexford, and Meath, which, to the number of ten or twelve thousand, were to rendezvous in the vicinity of Dublin, and be ready to pour in their force in aid of the metropolitan outbreak, on a given signal. Holt had actually advanced, on the evening of the 23d July, so near to the scene of action as Rathfarnham, (a village only a league from Dublin,) when his further progress was suspended by the intelligence of the defeat and dispersion of the disorganized rabble which attacked Dublin; and which, although contemptible in numbers and array, and without any known or ostensible leaders, took the Government so much by surprise, that their precipitancy alone averted the most lamentable mischief. The atrocious although unpremeditated murder of the Lord Chief Justice Kilwarden in the streets, when on his way to attend a council, would have proved but the prelude to more extensive butcheries, had the rebellious crew had any one man of talent and sufficient daring to direct their excited energies. The insurgents, to the amount of some thousands, had proceeded within musket-shot of the Castle of Dublin (the seat of Government) ere their mad career received a check, by the appearance of a body of cavalry and infantry, called suddenly to arms. Had such a man as Holt been at their head, there can be little doubt that the Lord Lieutenant, and the officers of the State, would have become the prize of this desperate attack; but in vain the rebels looked for a leader. They stood a volley from the infantry, and a charge from the cavalry, with desperate resolution; but, unled and unsupported, they fled in all directions through the numerous streets and alleys; and, under cover of the falling twilight, escaped with comparatively small loss. The fate of this body decided Holt's movements. He saw the chance was lost by the rashness of this premature attack—which, happily for the tranquillity of the country, was so speedily put down—and withdrawing his own followers from their allies of the hour, he made an instant retrograde movement, anticipating that every effort would be made to cut off his retreat to the mountains. His march was unceasingly pursued while the darkness of night afforded him an escape from observation; and the morning's light saw him and his band of rebels safe within their old positions, unbroken in numbers and unsubdued in spirit.

The proclamation of martial law, the calling out of the yeomanry for permanent duty, and the reinforcement of all the military posts in the districts bounding on Dublin, in a few days restored some show of tranquillity to the lately alarmed and still agitated city. But the insurrection, though checked, had not been entirely crushed; but few prisoners were taken in the night's action of the 23d, and of these not one person of note or respectability: the reputed leaders and promoters of the movement were yet at large.

Holt, once more secure within his chain of posts, unknown and inaccessible to all but the experienced mountaineer, defied all the powers of the executive. Various expeditions were undertaken to bring him to action; but not one met with even partial success. His superior knowledge of the scene of warfare enabled him to anticipate and defeat every movement of the troops. His scouts were numerous and faithful: nothing in the garb of soldier or stranger could enter the mountain district without Holt being immediately apprized of the circumstance. Itinerant beggars, sham cripples, even children, were on the look-out to guard his haunts, and make some signal on the approach of danger. His depredations were latterly confined to midnight attacks on the small parties of troops scattered along the extensive line of military roads which had for some years been in progress through the mountains. In the course of one night, his parties had been known to sweep away all vestige of the labour of weeks—plunder the provision magazines—demolish the guard-houses—disperse and drive in the picquets, pursuing them, pike in hand, to the very gates of their stockaded barracks—then disappear, as if by magic, before the morning's dawn, leaving neither trace nor clew to their mountain retreat; while, on the very next night, a similar and equally vigorous attack would be made on a post thirty miles distant. "Holt," the Rebel Chief, was at once a word of terror and reproach. Five hundred guineas of reward were offered by Government for his apprehension; yet, amongst the shoeless, ragged, half-starved outlaws he commanded, not one could be found to betray his chief! Was this a virtue or a crime? Posterity will answer the question!

The officer whom we have introduced to the reader, as a volunteer for this dangerous enterprise, was a young Scotchman, of the humblest fortunes. He had served in Holland and in Egypt with much credit; and was esteemed by his corps as a man of distinguished courage, fortitude, and perseverance. With a young wife and two children to support on his humble pay, his enjoyments, it may be supposed, were but few. Life he held at nought, except for the sake of his family, to whom he was fondly attached, and for whose benefit he volunteered this present hazard. The excellence of his character in his regiment gained for him favourable consideration at headquarters; and the pledge he so earnestly requested having been unreservedly given, he prepared for his departure with his characteristic zeal and alacrity.

Whatever plans he might originally have contemplated to effect his purpose, they were forced to yield to one arranged by a conclave of official dignitaries, before whom he appeared, to receive his instructions. He was directed to select a non-commissioned officer, and twenty of the most active, intelligent, and trustworthy men from his own regiment, to accompany him as the expeditionary force. The soldiers were to be disguised in the uniform of the drivers of the commissariat waggon train, himself wearing that of a sergeant-conductor of that corps. Thus equipped, the whole were to be incorporated, and march with a detachment of the commissariat train conveying the monthly supply of provisions and stores to the several dépôts established in the new line of road in the mountains, (in the progress of which the officer was to collect all the information he could obtain of the rebel chief and his parties.) This duty performed, the whole party was directed to take the short route across the mountains on their return towards Dublin; on which track it was supposed they might fall in with some of the parties of the rebel chief, and, by possibility, himself. This ruse was suggested, it was said, by the then Commissary General, as a bait for the rebels—several small bodies of whom had, on former occasions, intercepted detachments of the waggon train on this route; and to whom they offered no molestation, (that corps being an unarmed body,) except a rigid examination for concealed arms or ammunition. Several of the drivers attached to the present expedition alleged that, on some of these occasions, they had seen the General; but subsequent events proved that his precautions to conceal or disguise himself were so effectual, that, of the various descriptions published of his person, appearance, and equipment, not one was found to be correct.

Plunder, beyond the means of subsistence for his daily diminishing force, no longer appeared to be the object of the rebel chief, whose hopes of a successful rising had all been abandoned, when he learned the capture and execution of that ill-fated youth, Robert Emmett; and, as a last resource, he contemplated an escape to America; previously to which, he sought to reduce his followers, and eventually disband them, as opportunities offered for their return to their distant homes with safety. They had stuck by him through all the vicissitudes of his fortune, and he determined to share their perils until he alone was left to encounter the last danger. This state of the rebel chief's affairs was in part, known to the Government, and it was imagined he might be captured by a coup de main in some unguarded moment of fancied security: such was the object of the present expedition.

The convoy marched from Dublin about forty strong, including the military whose arms were concealed on the carriages. After a march of four days, during which the whole line of posts were supplied, the party proceeded on their return with the empty cars, taking (as previously arranged) the old mountain track—a road so little used, since the year 1798, as to be scarcely distinguishable from the naked face of the barren mountain. On leaving behind them the last military post, the party halted at noon to water and feed the cattle, forming their bivouac beside a mountain stream. The lieutenant took that opportunity of distributing the arms and ammunition, and giving his final instructions. Each soldier was directed to seat himself beside his musket on a car, to be ready for instant action, but on no account to make any display of the arms until the moment for using them arrived.

An idiot boy, (who either was, or assumed to be dumb,) in a state of destitution, had attached himself to the party the first day it entered the mountains; and who, for the reward of a biscuit, and fragments of the men's rations, had rendered service by fetching water, and cutting heather, for cooking, on the three preceding days' marches. Of this wretched object no suspicions whatever were entertained; but his sudden disappearance, during this short halt—no one could tell how or where—raised a momentary alarm; and although it was accounted for, by some, as the boy's terror at the sight of the fire-arms, the lieutenant could not divest himself of the suspicion of treachery, and therefore drew together his party in as compact a body as the long line of cars admitted, enjoining the strictest silence, and concealment of the arms. The party proceeded unmolested, and, apparently, unobserved, for two or three hours, gradually surmounting a long range of hills, which they had been ascending since morning; when, on rounding a projecting knoll which lay in their route, the cars of the lieutenant, who had ridden a few yards in front, were saluted with the whizz of a ball, which passed within a few inches of his head. The order—"Halt! stand by your arms," brought in an instant twenty fine light-infantry men into rank, and ready for action. As yet, however, no enemy appeared. The party then cautiously advanced, until, having left the knoll a couple of hundred yards in their rear, the lieutenant once more halted them and prepared for action. Feeling satisfied that they were in the presence of an unseen foe, he made a keen reconnoissance of the position, and more particularly of that part over which the thin blue smoke of the lately discharged fire-arms still lightly floated. Orders were given to the sergeant of the drivers' corps to form his cars in a hollow square, into which the party might retire and sustain the battle, in the event of an attack from superior numbers. This precaution taken, the officer dismounted, and, armed with his double-barrelled gun, proceeded to take a nearer view of the localities of his ground. In front, and about a mile distant, was the towering summit of the Ram's Head; beneath the craggy base of which stupendous cliff, lay their scarcely discernible route: on the right, an open and partly broken range of sterile mountains for many miles, extended towards Blessinton: between which and their present position, and not above three miles distant, a small military party was stationed during the day. The left presented the rough and tangled side of the mountain, sweeping with a continuous descent far as the eye could reach into the deep and lonely valley. The chief object in their rear was the knoll they had so lately passed, between which and the party nothing could approach unobserved. There was not a tree or shrub of sufficient size to form an ambuscade for any number of men within the whole range of his vision; but the lieutenant's ready eye saw that the low brakes of furze and tufts of fern, as well as the detached pieces of rock, which lay scattered about, afforded a secure shelter for a single lurking foe. The afternoon was overcast and sultry; that awful stillness which is only to be found on the mountain or in the desert, reigned around, unbroken by a single sound from the lips of the well-disciplined soldiers. Silence and the most intense anxiety prevailed for a quarter of an hour, without a move, without a whisper, when the lieutenant fancied he perceived a slight motion in a brake of furze about fifty yards on his left. He stealthily approached the spot, with a keen and fixed gaze, when his suspicions were confirmed by seeing a human face cautiously rise from the furze, and, after casting a wary look upon him, again bury itself in the brake. He had just time to send a bullet in that direction, when he beheld the idiot boy rolling and scrambling down the slanting mountain side, as he conceived, wounded; he soon, however, sprang to his feet, bounding off like a deer, and, before the lieutenant could discharge his other barrel, his figure disappeared, as if the earth had opened to receive him. With greater caution the officer rushed forward to secure the traitor, shouting to the sergeant to send a file of men to his aid; but just at that moment a body of rebels, to the number of fifty or upwards, sprung up from every brake and tuft, like tigers from their lair, roused by the lieutenant's fire, and commenced their attack on the party with a savage fury, sufficient to appall more gallant hearts. Their assault was met by a steady volley, which checked their advance, and sent some of the assailants, writhing in agony, down the mountain's side. Nor was the rebels' volley ineffectual. Three soldiers fell wounded by the first discharge; after which several attempts were made to storm the position into which the soldiers had taken shelter, but each attack was met with vigour. Several of the rebels were bayoneted while scaling the cars which formed the temporary safeguard; but against such a superiority in numbers, a much longer resistance was hopeless; particularly as the drivers' corps were entirely useless from want of arms. Fortunately the rebels seemed to be but scantily supplied with ammunition; they had therefore to depend chiefly on their pikes—a weapon which the troops could not have contended against, but for the protection afforded by their barrier of cars. An effort, however, became necessary to extricate themselves from this unequal contest. Availing himself of a momentary cessation of hostilities on his front, the sergeant despatched two of the drivers from the rear, unobserved, to search for the officer, for whose safety he now entertained the deepest apprehensions. Perceiving the rebels concentrating their force to make one desperate attack on his little party, the sergeant, with a degree of skill and gallantry which would have done honour to a higher grade in the service, instantly determined to give the assault, rather than wait to receive it. One of the cars having been removed, the party made a vigorous sally on the besiegers of their position: forming a line, they poured a volley upon the rebel ranks, and then charged bayonets at the top of their speed for half a minute. The rebels, panic struck for the moment, dispersed and fled; while the sergeant and his party, taking advantage of their confusion, suddenly wheeled round, and were three or four hundred yards beyond the rebels' fire ere the latter had collected and reformed. Directing his retreat towards the nearest military position, the sergeant maintained his party unbroken, and kept his pursuers at a distance for some time, by the active fire of his covering party. But it was not in human nature to hold out much longer; the rebels were gaining ground each moment; every effort which skill and courage could suggest were made, but the odds were overwhelming. At length, seeing themselves within one hundred yards of the deadly pike, the gallant soul, with his panting and almost exhausted party, turned on their pursuers, and standing, like lions at bay, determined to sell their lives dearly. At this awful moment, the distant cheer of friendly voices (so different from the rebels' wild "Hurra!") broke on their ears, and revived their sinking but unsubdued hearts. Another, and a nearer cheer, followed by a random volley at the rebels, assured them that succour was at hand. In another minute, or came a party of fresh troops, headed by an officer, at a running pace, whose appearance soon turned the tide of battle. The sound of the musketry had fortunately reached the ears of the advanced sentinel of this picquet nearly an hour before; and the whole line having been placed on the alert, on the march of the party across the mountain, the officer, following the direction of the sound, lost no time in hastening to the rescue, and happily arrived in time to save a handful of gallant men from massacre. The retreat now became an advance, with fresh courage and renewed hopes. But the wary rebels, on the first appearance of the red-coats, had relaxed their pursuit, and having gained a rising ground, they discharged a few shots; then, with a simultaneous shout, fled like a flock of affrighted birds in every direction, leaving the bewildered military at a loss what course to pursue. A few bullets were sent after the fugitives, but with what effect could not be known.

The former position regained, the drivers, the horses, and carriages, were found uninjured. The rebels had disappeared at the same time with the troops, and no fresh party had approached. Having, in their united parties, thirty effective men, the officer directed his attention to a search for the missing lieutenant—a task which the sergeant, with half-a-dozen of his own men, anxiously undertook; but, after an hour's absence, they returned unsuccessful; and, to add to their fears for their officer's safety, the two drivers, who had been sent in pursuit of him during the action, returned about dusk, exhausted with fatigue, and in utter despair at what all now considered the certain loss of the gallant lieutenant. They had traversed miles in various directions without seeing a human being, or any trace of footsteps, save in the immediate vicinity of the position; and also the impress of the bodies of the rebels in the clumps of furze and fern. It was evident that they had withdrawn from that side of the mountain for the present. The wounded soldiers were despatched, on a car, to the nearest military post, for surgical aid, and with a demand for a reinforcement. The united party made their arrangements to bivouac for the night in their present position, placing sentinels at all points, and lighting a fire to attract the attention of the absent lieutenant, should he still linger in their vicinity.

We must now return to that luckless adventurer whom we left in full chase of the traitorous impostor, and whose sudden disappearance so astonished his pursuer. In the ardour of his pursuit, and with eyes intently fixed on the spot where the boy had so unaccountably vanished, the lieutenant fell headlong into a narrow but deep ravine, or mountain gully, with a grassy bottom, the edges of which were so thickly fringed with a border of luxuriant fern, as to be almost entirely concealed. In his rapid descent along its slippery bed, he became entangled with some living object, which clung to him with such desperate tenacity, that he felt it impossible to disengage himself: a further descent, accelerated by their mutual struggles, brought him on the green sward of a level patch of the mountain, clutched in the deadly grasp of the idiot boy, who now evinced a degree of strength far beyond that which his former apparently feeble and imbecile appearance indicated. The lieutenant had but a moment left for reflection: to use his gun were impossible, gripped and encircled as he was; but one dreadful alternative was left him, either to shake off his assailant, or perish in his grasp by the pikes of the rebel party. On setting out on this expedition, he had secreted in his breast pocket a short dagger, which he intended to use only in the last extremity, in the event of a close encounter with the rebels. This weapon he found means to disengage: in one moment it flashed before the starting eyes of the pretended idiot; in the next it was buried to the hilt in the nape of his neck. The long and piercing shriek of the wounded wretch, who, relaxing his hold, now lay rolling and bleeding on the earth, attracted a small party of the rebels to the spot. The lieutenant, surrounded and hemmed in by at least a dozen of pikes, was compelled to surrender. He was seized, disarmed, and hurried or rather dragged away, he knew not whither, by four of the party; while the distant shouts of the enfuried rebels, then engaged in close action with his party, mixing with the heartening cheers of his own men, as they sent in their steady volleys, rung on his distracted ear. Each moment hurried him still farther from the scene of action; but the regularity of the British fire, which he could recognise and distinguish from the hurried and only occasional discharges from the rebel arms, cheered him with the hope that they had not materially suffered, but would maintain their ground until succour arrived. To him this was but a melancholy consolation—his fate seemed fixed. After a harassing march or rather run of two or three miles, within the mazes of the trackless mountain, the prisoner and his escort descended into a wild and savage glen, which presented no other token of human habitation save a faint stream of dusky smoke, which stole along the heather, scarcely rising above its surface, as it issued from a low heath-covered hovel, towards which the lieutenant was conducted by his guard. After challenging these within, in the Irish language, and receiving their answer, one of the escort proceeded to blindfold his prisoner, by tying his handkerchief over his eyes. The first and most natural suspicion in the poor lieutenant's mind was, that his last moments in this mortal life had arrived; and he prepared to meet his fate in uncomplaining silence; but after the lapse of a few minutes, the bandage was removed; the party who had been within the hovel on his arrival, having, as he presumed, retired during his temporary darkness. He was led inside. The floor of this wretched hut was some feet below the level of the surrounding turf, and had evidently been hollowed out to form a cavern of retreat. Here he was deprived of his watch, money, pocketbook, and his instructions from headquarters: and it was intimated to him, that no further removal was intended until they received the General's orders. The poor prisoner, with a heart overwhelmed by grief and disappointment, gave way to the most poignant feelings of self-reproach, at his indiscretion in allowing himself to be betrayed to such a distance from his party. The thoughts of his own death, which he looked upon as the inevitable consequence of his capture, did not affect him with one half the bitterness of sorrow which his reflections on his failure and disgrace brought to his agonized mind. He knew not whether the traitor boy had perished by his hand or not; but the certainty, that to his treachery he owed his misfortune, stifled all feelings of remorse at the summary vengeance he had inflicted. The evening, already lowered; the dark clouds rolled down the mountainside in gloomy masses; the sun for a moment appeared, and, shedding the blood-red tinge of its departing rays on the peak of the lofty Sugar Loaf, sunk beneath the dark and distant hills. An awful gloom hung over the dreary scene! The lieutenant, overpowered by chagrin, and worn out by fatigue, sunk on his rude couch of fern and heather, to seek a brief repose, when his second hour's unsettled slumbers were disturbed by the tramp of many feet outside the hovel, and the piteous groans of some persons, whom he concluded to be the wounded of that day's action. One of the two men who had been left to guard him, repaired to the opening of the hut, and, after holding some converse with a party outside, whose tone (although in a language not understood by the lieutenant) seemed to imply command, the guard returned to the side of the rough bed of the captive, intimating, that the shelter of the hovel was required for some of their wounded comrades. Misery levels all distinctions! The poor lieutenant was preparing to resign his humble berth; but this the guard refused, and even, in respectful terms, expressed his concern at the inconvenience the officer would be exposed to in that miserable place. Four unhappy wretches, with gun-shot wounds, were borne in, and a rude litter of heather spread for their repose. But a night of horror ensued. Distant thunders rolled along the desolate range of mountains which surrounded their dismal glen, through which the moaning wind swept, in sad accordance with the piercing moans of the unfortunate unattended sufferers within this narrow prison. As the night advanced, the elements seemed to be engaged in horrid conflict; the awful peals of thunder following each other in rapid succession, united in wild reverberation, while the vivid lightning seemed to bestow permanent illumination on this contracted scene of human suffering and terror! The wounded wretches, agonized by pain, and tormented by a burning thirst, cried aloud for water! or a bullet to end their miseries! But it was not until after midnight that the torrent, rushing from the mountains by a thousand rills, afforded a supply of the grateful fluid, to the parched lips of the almost expiring sufferers. Nor was it less acceptable to that silent sufferer, the captive lieutenant, into whose portion of the welcome draught one of his guards insisted on pouring a drop of whisky, while the other prevailed on him to accept a piece of biscuit, the slender remains of their last plunder. The officer received these proofs of kindness with an expression of gratitude; and was then taught the lesson, that pity and humanity had yet a resting-place within the rebel's bosom.

The night was one of unmitigated horror within the wretched hovel, and with the detachment on the distant mountain almost equally so. After a night of care and anxious watchfulness, their morning broke without tale or tidings of the respected and now lamented officer. The Dublin party proceeded on their march to headquarters, with the painful conviction on their mind that their gallant lieutenant had fallen a victim to the savage vengeance of the rebel Holt.

When the first beams of the morning's light broke through the crevices of the hovel's roof, it disclosed a horrid scene. Two of the unhappy wretches had yielded up their guilty spirits during the night, and the others lay senseless to all but the torment of their festering wounds. The lieutenant implored his guard to allow him to enjoy the invigorating air of the early morn, if only for a few minutes. His jaded senses required that relief: he had awoke from feverish dreams only to the keener reality of his error and misfortune. Great was his surprise and gratitude at finding his request complied with; and his guard was in the act of assisting him to rise, when some voice of authority suspended the movement until the bandage was placed over his eyes: this done, he was led forth. Some person appeared to enter as he departed; and he fancied he heard a prayer, in the Latin tongue, uttered in a low tone of voice. By the time he had reached, according to his calculation, a dozen yards from the hovel's entrance, he was halted, as if for the inspection of some, to him invisible, spectator; after which an order was given, in a tone of authority, (but in the Irish language,) which, after a few moments preparation, set the captive and his guard once more on the march. More than half an hour elapsed, during which period they were constantly ascending, ere the bandage was removed from the eyes of the lieutenant, when he was invited to repose by the guard, which had been increased to four. He cast his eyes around, but sought in vain the scene of the last night's horrors: all about him breathed peace and tranquillity. They had reached a verdant and sheltered spot, where the blooming heather, refreshed by the late rain, scented the air with its grateful perfume. The morning breeze, playing over his burning cheek, revived, with almost magical effect, his physical powers; while the painful certainty of his hopeless captivity, and probable execution before that glorious sun which now rose in splendour over the glistening mountain top should again set in darkness, weighed heavily on his heart. All his attempts to stifle the thoughts of wife, of children, and of home, were vain; they predominated over all others, and could not, for a moment, be banished from his tortured breast. He could not but believe that his doom had that morning been pronounced. The party whose arrival at the hovel caused such a stir, and before whom he was led, blindfolded, for inspection, was, perhaps, the Rebel Chief, into whose power he had so unguardedly thrown himself; or, if not the chief, some second in authority, whose sanguinary decree would meet with prompt obedience. Would the Government consider his destitute family entitled to provision under all the circumstances of his failure? Stunned by these reflections, he resumed the march, passively, almost listlessly, moving beside his guard, wrapt in deep and gloomy meditation. After a silent march of two or three hours, they gradually wound their footsteps down the mountain side, and at length reached a secluded valley, through which a narrow rivulet flowed. On the bank of this stream stood a solitary cabin, of rude formation, two sides being afforded by nature, in the projecting points of a moss-covered rock; the others by walls of mud and straw ; the roof securely thatched with the rough produce of the soil. There was an air of security in this romantic spot, (which appeared to be shut out from human observation,) that rendered it a most fitting place of retreat. A few domesticated goats browsed about, undisturbed in this peaceful little valley ; all beyond and around which was wildness and desolation. As the party approached the cabin, three half-clad but robust children ran forth, as if to greet with their embraces some anxiously-expected visitors. The sight of these little ones kindled all the father's feelings in the heart of the poor captive ; and when, on nearer approach, they accepted his proffered hands, he took the little savages one by one to his arms, while tears of fond recollection poured down his manly cheeks. The mother of these children, who appeared for a moment at the door of the cabin to answer the inquiry of one of the guard, beheld this affecting sight with all a mother's tenderness ; and, retiring within the cabin, she returned in another minute with a large bason of milk and a piece of girdle-bread, which was respectfully presented to the lieutenant by one of his guards. Seated on the rivulet's bank, a short distance from the lowly dwelling, and surrounded by the children, he enjoyed in thankfulness his humble and, as he imagined, his last repast. During this period of repose and refreshment, he perceived, as he thought, a degree of restless anxiety in the countenance of his guards, who had evidently expected to see some superior in that lonely valley. One of the two men who had so kindly relieved his wants the night before, ascended the mountain's brow, at the desire of the woman ; but returned to express, as the lieutenant supposed, (for the conversation was carried on in Irish,) his disappointment. A long consultation took place, the woman apparently urging delay, in which she was seconded by the guard who had passed the night at the hut, while the two strangers who had that morning joined seemed much disinclined for any. The lieutenant heard the word general mentioned as, on each occasion, one or other of the party looked up the mountain track. After a racking suspense of nearly an hour's duration, the guard moved slowly from the cabin, encircling their prisoner, who moved his hands in grateful thanks to the woman as he cast his last look on her and the children. Leaving the rivulet's side, the party proceeded through the valley, which darkened to the view as the impending rocks rose in awful and abrupt masses on either side, screening from sight the noonday sun. Suspicious looks, and low whispers, passed between the guards. The impatience of those who had that morning joined, and the undisguised reluctance of the others, to execute some important order, of which he was, of course, the object, left no doubt on the lieutenant's mind as to his approaching fate. Not more than a quarter of an hour had elapsed since they left the cabin, the direct distance from which could not have exceeded a furlong, when, after a brief altercation between his guards, one of those of the preceding night approached to his side, and, with evident emotion, announced that "their march had ended !" a sentence which struck on the ear of the captive as the signal for immediate death. His heart for a moment sank under the shock ; the colour forsook his manly countenance as the thoughts of all most dear to him rushed on his distracted memory ; he cast his eyes towards the blue unclouded heavens, which shone like a narrow streak of light above the horrid chasm, and on his knees resigned himself to silent prayer ! With his face buried in his hands, he remained undisturbed for several minutes, and almost unconscious of existence, when he felt himself gently enfolded in the arms of some kind benevolent being. On opening his eyes, he beheld, kneeling beside him, a venerable looking man, in soiled and faded black clothes, who, with all the fervency of the priestly profession, entreated him to accept the consolations of religion in these his last moments of life !

The guards, on the approach of the priest, had withdrawn to some short distance ; but as the doomed one cast his bewildered glance around, he perceived one of them armed with his own double-barrelled gun. Hitherto he had anticipated a horrid and ignominious death by the pike or the halter ; it was therefore a relief to the gallant soldier's mind, to think (as appearances indicated) that he would at least meet a soldier's death ! Even that thought brought its consolation. Grateful for the attentions of the reverend Father, he felt all the difficulty of declining, without offence, his spiritual aid ; but the kind pastor, availing himself of the privilege of his sacred office, to extend the respite between life and death to the latest possible moment, listened to those communications on his worldly affairs which the afflicted lieutenant thought fit to confide to him. He was requested to write to his wife (whom her devoted husband already considered a forlorn widow) all the circumstances of his capture, his sufferings, and ultimate fate ! Then taking a kind farewell of the deeply-affected priest, he declared to his approaching executioners his readiness to meet his fate. With trembling hands and palpitating heart, the good pastor took on himself the last sad office of placing the bandage over the eyes of the victim ; and, with a fervent benediction and invocation to divine mercy, was about to hurry from the horrid scene, when the shriek of a female voice—the cries of "Stor ! Stor !"—the sound of fast approaching footsteps—fixed him to the spot. Standing, with uplifted arms and exposed breast, in front of the kneeling lieutenant, he suspended the execution. In another minute, the bandage was torn from the captive's eyes by that generous woman who had so lately and kindly relieved his necessities. She was followed by a stern but care-worn looking man, in plain attire, but armed at all points, whose angry chidings could not, for a moment, arrest her humane purpose. After him crept the children, with fearful step ; and when they saw their mother raise the drooping lieutenant from his kneeling posture, they instantly ran towards him and renewed their caresses.

"O spare his life, husband of my heart!" cried the woman. "O father of my children, have mercy upon him! On my bare knees, I ask it."

The poor children, seeing their mother on her knees, in the attitude of supplication, happily unconscious of the awful cause, knelt beside her; and, catching the infection of her tears, put up their little hands, and cried aloud—"O father, father!"

The husband advanced towards his captive with haughty stride and scornful brow, while his quivering lip and moistened eye betrayed his better feelings.

"Look!" said he, while his varied passions almost choked his utterance—"Look upon that poor woman! now pleading, on her knees, for the life of him who came, under a mean disguise, into the last wretched retreat your cruel Government has left us—our wild and desolate mountains—to destroy the life of her husband! her only support or protection on earth! and throw these poor innocents, destitute and despised, on a hard, unfeeling world. Behold the REBEL CHIEF! the proscribed, the hated HOLZ, whose blood you were sworn to shed, now before you! These"—pointing to the papers of which the lieutenant had been despoiled the previous day—"inform me of all your plans; and this proclamation shews for what you sought my blood. Oh," added the rebel, in a subdued and melancholy tone, "one half of this reward would have transported me and mine to a far distant land of liberty; but nothing but my blood will satisfy your rulers. You see, sir," said the chief, scornfully, "that we can yet defend ourselves!"

The lieutenant would not condescend to offer a word in vindication of his share in the expedition; and, scorning to supplicate for life with such an enemy, he folded his arms, and coolly said—"I am in your power, chief—take your revenge!"

The peculiarly broad Scotch accent in which these words were uttered, seemed to startle the rebel; who hastily called one of the guards to his side, who received from his chief some angry rebuke, and a command to order the others to fall back. Turning to the lieutenant, he again addressed him, saying—

"No, sir—your life is now safe! but had you been an Irishman, as your name implies,* by Him who died for us on the Cross, you should have been shot like a dog, and your bones left to bleach on the wildest crag of our naked mountain! As it is, your life is no longer in danger. Thank that broken-hearted woman for the delay that saved it. She saw you caress her children; she felt that you were a father; and for the sake of that father, who, God knows how soon, may stand in need of all their prayers, she pleaded for your life; and it is now granted."

* The lieutenant bore the name of a family peculiarly obnoxious to the Irish in those days.

The rebel chief then raised his still kneeling wife, and pressed her fondly to his heart; then, turning once more to the captive, said—

"You must be content to remain our prisoner, and share our mountain misery for a few days. The same men who have been your guards shall remain with you, as well to prevent escape as to protect you against the vengeance of others. The blood of five poor souls lies on your head, and those who sent you; but fear nothing from me."

Then, taking up a child in each arm, whom he alternately kissed, he strode away towards the solitary cabin, closely followed by his wife. The good priest, with tears of joy in his eyes, took an arm of the lieutenant in kind support, who on the other bore the youngest child of this ill-fated pair, whose little arm was entwined round his neck. In this order, followed by the guard, the whole party reached the miserable cabin, into an inner apartment of which the lieutenant was led; the interior consisting of three comfortless chambers, presented a melancholy picture of that state of danger and privation to which this once respectable family had been reduced. Here, left to his reflections, the poor captive found leisure to contemplate his strange and anomalous situation. But, half an hour before, the doomed and detested enemy—now the pardoned and protected guest of the rebel chief. While pondering on the strange events of the last twenty-four hours, and still half doubtful of his ultimate fate, one of the men left to guard him broke in on his reveries, to intimate that the priest was about to take his departure, and had obtained the chief's leave to receive the lieutenant's commands. The worthy man entered; and, having expressed his joy at the happy termination of the captive's late heavy trial, renewed his promise to write to the wife of the officer. But how to announce the glad tidings of his safety?

"My mission," said the priest, "into these wild scenes is now accomplished. I am permitted to communicate to your family your personal safety—more I know not. Led into these dreary regions in the darkness of the blind, even so I must return on quitting this valley. Miles must be traversed ere I gain my well-known road, and then the light of heaven will be restored to me. Though death and danger stand in our path, the ministers of our religion dare not deny the Christian's right whenever 'tis demanded—even to the guilty outlaw. Farewell, stranger! Your bidding shall be faithfully performed. And, O may the mercy of the rebel teach your heart the lesson of pity and forgiveness! Heaven prosper you!"

In a few minutes, the noise of a horse's footsteps called the attention of the lieutenant, who, peeping from the single pane which formed the window of his prison, beheld the good pastor depart with bandaged eyes, taking the route up the mountain's side by which he had himself that morning descended. The horse was led by one of the ragged crew, while another walked beside it, each armed with a pike and pistol. Exhausted by fatigue and anxiety, the prisoner sought that repose which his late sufferings demanded. And here we must leave him—secure at least of life—to take a view of what was passing in the capital.

On the evening of that eventful day, the defeated party reached Dublin. The sergeant who took the command, on the supposed massacre of his officer, was next day examined before a privy council, to whom he gave a circumstantial account of all the events of their brief but calamitous expedition. Rendered furious by fresh defeat, and disappointed vengeance, that sanguinary party, to whose dominion the destinies of unhappy Ireland had been too long committed, were loud in their demand for fresh sacrifices. All moderate measures, all invitations to concession and surrender, were denounced; and vengeance was their cry! Alas! against whom? A poor unfortunate outcast, who scorned their power; but yet one whom a word of kind promise would have brought a voluntary captive within the castle gates. Blood had already been profusely shed—accursed martial law, with all its horrors, had contaminated and despoiled the land. Executions, attended with all the brutalizing and disgusting butcheries consequent to a conviction for high treason—the hangings, beheading, and embowelling, (literally performed,) had stained and polluted every leading street of the metropolis. Yet there was one party unsated, whose cry was still—“More blood!” A fresh expedition to the mountains, consisting of one thousand light troops, was recommended; a renewed proclamation issued, increasing the reward for Holt's body, dead or alive, to ONE THOUSAND GUINEAS!!! and a free pardon to his betrayer or assassin. These had scarcely been posted on the walls of the city, when intelligence reached the family of the lieutenant of his perfect safety, with the addition that he owed his life to the clemency of the generous Holt! The letter, written by the priest to the lieutenant's wife, appeared in all the papers; many of the proclamations were, in the course of that night, torn down or defaced, and songs and placards in praise of the brave Holt substituted. All this was wormwood to that odious party whose names will descend to posterity with merited execration.

The untalented, but merciful and humane Earl Hardwicke, was the Viceroy of that day; who, following the counsels of the British Cabinet, had hitherto resigned himself to the guidance of the dominant party, but now called to his confidence and aid the few enlightened patriots who boldly withstood their country's degradation, and proudly maintained their independent station, untainted by bigotry, unsubdued by corruption, and unawed by those terrors which sent to exile or the grave so many of the friends of freedom and of law. Under their advice, the plan of a general amnesty was drawn up, in order to be submitted to the British Government, and one which would embrace the greater number of the deluded rebel party that yet remained in arms. This measure was, of course, warmly opposed by those whose trade was discord, who lived on the distractions of their common country; but was hailed by the more humane and politic as a coming blessing to the long-distracted nation.

In the course of a week the lieutenant himself arrived at the headquarters of his regiment, having been unconditionally released. He reported that, within the last few days of his captivity, an important change in his treatment had taken place: his gun had been restored to him, together with his watch and other property; he had been allowed the range of the mountains, with only one man as his escort, and him he considered more as a protector than a guard. The chieftain's band had been dissolved, and had retired by numbers each night to their different destinations; but few remained of the once powerful Holt's rebel party; and those apparently his own relations or dependents.

The chief himself disappeared for a few days; but, on his return to his lonely cabin, he hastily removed his family, and, within a few minutes from their departure, the humble fabric was consigned to the flames! Holt, seizing the arm of the lieutenant, and pointing to the blaze, exclaimed—“Behold, sir, the last poor shelter of the Rebel Chief is now destroyed! You are free! Your guard shall guide you to within a short distance of a military post. We have now nothing to conceal; and you will travel with open eyes. Farewell!”

The lieutenant expressed his sense of this generous conduct; and, taking the chieftain's hand, bestowed a grateful pressure, as he bade him farewell, wishing him happier days.

“One week more, sir,” replied Holt, “and I shall be happier, or in my grave!” then, pressing the officer's hand, he hastily withdrew.

A few days subsequent to the lieutenant's return, an unusual bustle and whispering, in the castle and its purlieus, indicated that some important event had occurred. The preparation for the march of the battalion of light infantry for the Wicklow Mountains, were all at once suspended; and, to add to the surprise of speculators, a regiment of Highlanders, which had long occupied the position on the new line of road in that district, for the defence of the works, was called in. The usual conjectures—a French fleet off Bantry Bay, or Loughswilly, or Galway, formed the gossip of the passing hour; but, in another day, the mystery was cleared up, by the public announcement, that the rebel general, Holt, was a prisoner in Dublin Castle!

The lovers of military law, and of the atrocities which that law sanctioned, were rejoicing in the prospect of another victim, when their hopes and expectations were suddenly checked, by a piece of intelligence, which set the “loyal” in a frenzy: no less than that Holt had made his peace with Government, and was to be allowed to depart, himself and family, to the colonies, under his Majesty's pardon, and at the expense of the Crown!

It was not until the lapse of some weeks that all the circumstances of the surrender of this extraordinary character became known; and, as they were of a romantic, and rather heroic description, the name of Holt obtained a degree of honourable celebrity for the while, which his former fortunes could not have promised; while they threw a veil of pity over his past errors.

On the dispersion of his followers, he collected, from the various places of concealment in which they had for years been secreted, whatever remained of his once respectable property; and having released the officer, and restored those articles, of which he had been deprived, he removed his family to some place of safety; then, assuming the plain dress of the ordinary farmers of that county, found means of eluding all the military posts and patrols during a rapid night march, and arrived in the suburbs of Dublin, unobserved and unknown. Here, it would appear, he must have remained a day or two in secret, collecting such information as the newspapers afforded, or as his private friends in the city could convey. He learned the safe arrival of the lieutenant, and saw the fresh proclamation for his apprehension or death, in which his person was (fortunately for him) most inaccurately described: a copy of which he found no difficulty in obtaining. With that in his pocket, and a paper, written by a friend, in the name of Fitzpatrick, addressed to Mr H——, a magistrate of the county of Wicklow, (and a gentlemen holding a confidential office under the Crown,) in which offers were made to give some important intelligence respecting the rebel Holt, he boldly rode off for that gentleman's residence, situated about fifteen miles from Dublin. This was a daring proceeding of Holt, in his native county too; but he had set his life upon the hazard.

Arriving at an early hour in the forenoon, he found, paraded in front of the mansion, the corps of yeomanry, which the magistrate commanded, many of whom had been within the length of the rebel's pike in the hour of action; but before whose gaze their late formidable chief now quietly passed unheeded, to present his credentials to the servant in waiting.

In a few minutes he was summoned to the study of Mr H——, whom he found at his table, amidst a mass of papers, the most prominent of which was the new proclamation. The chimney-rack was filled with arms of all descriptions; and the captain's holster pistols, which he had just finished loading, lay beside him on his table. He eyed Holt with a scrutinizing glance as he entered, but could perceive nothing in his calm and quiet appearance to excite fear or suspicion; however, to shew that he was not to be taken by surprise, he took up one of his pistols, as if examining the priming, remarking that, "in these times, it behoved every one to be on his guard; and now, Mr Fitzpatrick, be seated." Holt drew his chair close to the magistrate's table, whose hand still rested on his pistol, and who thus continued—"You tell me in this letter that the person of Holt is known to you?"

"Perfectly, sir, as well as my own brother's! I have known him from childhood," answered the rebel.

"Look, then, at this description," said the magistrate, offering the proclamation to Holt.

"I have one, sir," (unfolding that which he had brought from town,) "and certainly see some slight difference; but to me all descriptions are unnecessary; and, furthermore, sir, I can now give you a solemn assurance that I have the means of placing the rebel in your hands!"

"Then the reward shall, in that case, be yours; but why not have given information at the castle? when a sufficient force might have been sent with you to ensure his capture."

"Force, captain! ah, no! Holt never can be taken by force! You shall shortly know my reasons for making you the instrument of his capture; but for myself, it is not the temptation of the high reward that leads me to surrender him; for, O God! 'tis hard to give up a fellow-creature to an ignominious death, for the sake of paltry gold! to sacrifice a broken-hearted, and, perhaps, penitent man and his innocent family, for the lucre of money; not a guinea of which could ever bring luck or grace on the betrayer. No, sir, there are higher and better motives for my appearance here—the peace and tranquillity of the country I love."

"Whatever are your motives, Mr Fitzpatrick, I trust you do not mean to deceive or baffle us; if you do, sir, we have our remedy, you know. You should recollect that this rebel has been for years the terror of our country, the enemy of his King and his Government."

"No, sir!" suddenly exclaimed Holt, with an energy that rather startled the magistrate; "of the Government only—not of the King! It is my belief, that were the Lord Lieutenant to offer the poor man his life and liberty, he would withdraw for ever from the scene of his past crimes, and from the country, in which he has now neither house nor home, friend nor protector."

"That may be your opinion, sir; but no terms will ever be made with the rebel until he is in the power of Government; for what security could he offer for his compliance, even supposing that the Lord Lieutenant humanely consented to accept of his submission on these terms?"

"His honour, sir!" replied the rebel, with an emphasis which in an instant raised a feeling of suspicion in the magistrate's mind that he was conversing, if not with Holt himself, with some one of his band in the immediate confidence of the chief. He grasped his pistol, while he alternately glanced at the description given in the proclamation and the form and features of his visitor; then fixing his full dark eye on the yet unmoved and firm countenance of the stranger, authoritatively demanded—

"And pray, sir, who are you that thus so confidently vouch for the honour of the rebel chief?"

"Himself!—the unfortunate Holt!"

The magistrate attempted to raise the pistol, on which his hand had for some time rested; but ere he could accomplish the movement, one was close to his head, in the firm grasp of the rebel's hand, who, in a tone of humility and supplication, cried—

"Easy, easy, captain! Your hand, sir, must not be soiled by my poor blood; or, if it must be so, we die together! Hear me, sir. I promised to explain why I made you the instrument of the rebel's capture. You have been a blessing to our poor country under all its misfortunes, and often arrested the hand of the murderer from the throat of his unresisting victim. Unable to check the atrocities you hourly witnessed, without compromising your own character for loyalty, (that hackneyed cant-word of the tyrants of our island,) you have seen our poor houses in flames—our herds destroyed or plundered, our crops trampled upon—and ourselves hunted like wild beasts, by a brutal foreign soldiery, or the still more savage native yomanry let loose upon us to drive us to that rebellion which the Government itself provoked. You have seen all this; but you, sir, never wantonly oppressed us. Not a stick of your plantations, not a hair of your cattle, nor a sheaf of your crops, have ever been injured or plundered by me or mine. Whilst others were the firebrands to keep alive the flame of the rebellion, you, sir, were always the peace-maker to mediate between the weak misguided rebel and the all-powerful Government. To you, sir, I surrender myself!—do all you can to protect my poor wife and children, then dispose of me as you please."

Then, drawing from beneath his coat another pistol, he placed the muzzles of both towards his own breast, while he thrust them forward to the hands of the magistrate, saying, "Now, sir, the Rebel Holt is your defenceless prisoner."

A thousand conflicting feelings agitated the breast of the magistrate, a man whose humanity was equal to his courage, (and both were unquestionable.) All that rancorous feeling which, a few moments before, he entertained towards the daring rebel gradually yielded to sentiments of pity for his misfortunes, and admiration at his magnanimity. Ardently did he long to save him; but there was a bigoted council, and justly exasperated Government, to be won over to the side of mercy. His chief hope rested on the well-known humanity of the Lord Lieutenant. To see his Excellency—to make the first impression—was the great object of the magistrate's solicitude. A pledge once given by the humane Hardwicke, would ensure the safety of the rebel's life. His resolve was instantaneous. Ringing his bell, he ordered four horses for Dublin, without a moment's delay; and intimated to Holt the necessity for his being confined to the house till his return; assuring him that his name should not be divulged, and that no restraint, beyond confinement to the house, would be imposed on him. The officer next in command of the troops was called in, and informed that the stranger had made some important disclosures, and had still further communications to make to Government, and must not be lost sight of for one instant; but no questions were to be asked or answered, except as to his personal wants, which the servants were ordered to attend to. With a mind oppressed by anxiety, but still not wholly divested of hope, the worthy magistrate set off for Dublin Castle; and, in the course of a long and secret audience with the Lord Lieutenant and Chief Secretary, he rendered a full and, of course, the most favourable account of his most extraordinary interview that morning with the Rebel Chief, concluding with the announcement of his unconditional submission to his Excellency's clemency. Pity, mercy, and sound policy prevailed over all narrow or vengeful feelings. The pledge was given; and Mr H—— that evening returned to his mansion, the joyful messenger of pardon and of peace.

Next morning, without any parade, or even an escort of troops, the magistrate conveyed Holt in his carriage to Dublin Castle, where, for safety, he was lodged in the apartments appropriated for State prisoners.

Every information which the grateful Holt could afford was given with fidelity, and with no ordinary show of talent, shrewdness, and good sense, during his several examinations before the Privy Council. He acted as guide to the band of general and engineer officers who proceeded to the Wicklow Mountains to examine the various positions in which the rebel chief for so many years had sustained himself. Passes through apparently unfathomable gulphs, (the mere existence of which rested but on traditional accounts)—by means of which, communications were held with distant posts with a rapidity which baffled all professional calculation—were explored under his guidance. New lines of road, branching off from the great military way then in progress, were suggested and marked out by the intelligent Holt, as opening a ready access to the very heart of the mountain recesses. These, and every other service he could render, were his peace-offering and atonement for past offences, and an humble testimony of gratitude for Royal clemency.

In another month the fallen chieftain, from the deck of the vessel which conveyed this wretched family to a far distant shore, cast a long and lingering look on the blue hills of romantic Wicklow, the scene of his triumph and of his sorrows; and, pressing to his bosom the faithful partner of his past perils and future fortunes, he bestowed a tear and a blessing on the country of his heart.

A LESSON FOR LOVERS.

"Ma'am, I vow I loved you dearly,
Truly, fondly, and sincerely—
Smile, then, on me, prithee, cheerly."
"What, sir? I can't hear you."

"Hem! sweet girl, I'm all affection,
Penchant, ardour, predilection:
Take me, if you've no objection."
"What, sir? I can't hear you."

"Ma'am, ahem! I'm faint with screaming—
Surely, love, you must be dreaming;
Yet those eyes are brightly beaming."
"What, sir? I can't hear you."

"Can't you, really? well, how funny;
If it wasn't for her money
I'd ne'er think of matrimony."
"Thank you, sir; I hear you."

BURSCHEN SONG.

"Dicam noctemque continuare potando nulli probrum."

TACITUS de Mor. Germanorum.

NEXT to Shakspeareian hilarity, and Rabelaisian joviality, there is nothing of the hale hearty kind in nature which we are inclined to look upon with more favour than genuine German Burschikosity. Rabelais, indeed, is somewhat questionable; at least, it is not every man's affair to walk up to the neck in mire, and straightway bound up heavenwards with a step as light as winged Mercury, and a vestment as pure as Dian. But the German Bursch is no such portentous Behemoth of rude jollity: he is merely a roving rolloping young man, instinct with the strong tide of fresh vitality, flapping his wings triumphantly, and rejoicing in his strength.

"Der Jungling soll die Flügel regen
In Lieb und Hass gewaltig sich bewegen."

as Göethe says; in all times, and in all places, a most orthodox rule; but applicable especially to Germany, where the Bursch has long been accustomed to look upon himself as the impersonated beam-ideal of juvenile freedom, and the very pink and pattern of all that a well-conditioned young man is and ought to be. No doubt, on this side the channel, we are accustomed to look on this matter with other eyes; and next to a Neologic Doctor, capped by Strauss or Gesenius, there is perhaps no genus of German men whom the uninitiated Englishman is apt to look upon with more suspicion than the Bursch. But those who have lived in Germany, and spoken face to face with these good fellows, know better things. The German Bursch has his follies and absurdities, doubtless; but what young man has not? Are there no deep potations, no noisy revelries, no long-drawn midnight orgies, within the cloistered walls of Oxford and Cambridge? We do not think it is any man's duty to sow wild oats, as the phrase is; but young men are second children, trying to stand on their legs; and many an awkward flounder they make before they learn to walk. Besides, what an unreasonable fool is he who will demand luxuriance and restraint, inspiration and moderation, from the same thing at the same time! He who handles the pruning knife, rejoices that there is something to prune; for it is a sign of lusty vegetation; and a boy who cannot give and return a blow at school, on the great theatre of life will peep and creep among the back scenes, and no man care to ask what he is about.

But the German Bursch has one great and characteristic advantage above all other manifestations of the lusty young man: he splashes and dashes, and cuts his capers in an element to which, by a defective and perverse system of education, our British youth, as a body, are total strangers—we mean the element of Music. This is the true ether for the spiritual man to swim in: so Plato and the Greeks taught long ago; so the jovial Burschen daily and hourly practise; so the wisdom of Oxford and Cambridge, and the mighty god Mammon in this country, have not decided. Or do we wrong our country? Shall we attempt to answer the much disputed question—Are the English a musical people? We answer that all people are musical. God gave this gift to man, as he gave song to the birds—a part of the universal voice of joy, which is merely another name for existence triumphing in itself. But we Britons have, for the last two centuries, shamefully neglected the cultivation of this highest talent; and not only have we not advanced in the general culture of music, but we have retrograded far back into primitive barbarism. Of course we do not speak here of Italian operas, musical festivals, philharmonic concerts, choral societies, et id genus omne. These things (and we are thankful for it) have increased of late years, and will continue to increase; but they all partake too much of the character of exhibitions, to warrant our assuming, on such pretensions, the designation of a musical people. If music is not the intellectual atmosphere in which a people enjoys its daily existence, and habitually expresses its commonest feelings, that people is not musical. Make now the trial. Take an Oxonian Greek man and a Göttinger Bursch, and, in nineteen cases out of twenty, while the German not only enjoys music, but is a practical musician, the Englishman is altogether αμουσος, scarcely discerning a crotchet from a quaver. In the remaining twentieth case, you may possibly find, that our countryman is a more expert violinist or flutist than the foreigner; but, even when it is so, it is only a few amateurs and virtuosos against a nation of singers; and this seems to us pretty accurately to express the relation of the two nations, as regards the practice of music. We stop not here to inquire into the gross inconsistency of the Oxonian who studies Greek, and, at the same time, habitually neglects that which the wisdom of the Greeks declared to be the soul of all study; neither shall we trouble ourselves with investigating more minutely how it comes to pass, that what was necessary, in the days of Queen Elizabeth, to constitute the inward substance of a gentleman, should now, by many, be thought sufficiently honoured when treated as the outward adornment of a girl. We content ourselves with stating the fact: the German Bursch is an essentially musical young man; the English or the Scottish student essentially unmusical. The reason may lie here or it may lie there—non omnia possumus omnes; we make no unreasonable demands; but the fact is undeniable.

A very sensible and well-informed writer* has said, that to know England is to know English politics; to know Germany is to know German literature. In the one country the House of Commons, in the other the Universities, are the arena of the greatest intellectual activity. We concur entirely in this remark; and as it is not the dead learning, but the life of the universities, with which we have to do, the Englishman who desires really to know and love Germany will consider the Burschen no less worthy objects of his attention than the professors. The peculiarities of the Burschen life have, indeed, in these latter days, been shorn of their public glories by the state-scissors of the meddling Bureaucrats at Frankfort; but scissors can only clip and pare; and there is a soul in German university life (as, among other things, the recent demonstrations of independent spirit at Göttingen have shewn) that no Prussian police-packthread can strangle. The men who drove out Napoleon are gagged, but they are not asleep. The Burschen are a peculiar people; like the Israelites in Egypt, and the genuine Irish in Ireland, they cannot be annihilated. If the King of Prussia could remodel Bonn and Berlin upon the slavish monastic plan of Oxford and Cambridge, these institutions would be much more of a piece, doubtless, with his political system of paternal government. But the King of Prussia can no more annihilate the living spirit of freedom in the German universities, than the House of Commons in this country, were it composed altogether of the most systematic Tories, could annihilate the liberty of the British press. Notwithstanding Frankfort Decrees and Hanover ordinances, the German universities still live and flourish; and while they live, LIBERTY lives with them. There is much talk in the Burschen songs about FREYHEIT; and they look very superficially into the matter who see here talk only. True, the Bursch, as he himself sings, "must go home and be a Philistine," like other decent respectable people. To become a Philistine is the termination just as certain of the Burschen career, as death is of mortality. But the Bursch is not all dead; his arm only is paralyzed for a season. Besides, there are a few select Burschen always, who never leave the university: these, in after life, become professors; and, among this class, we are to look for the true prophets of German liberty; here are realized, in intellectual conquest at least, all the most rosy fancies of the liberty-intoxicated Bursch. We must be allowed to connect the free speculations of Wolf and Niebuhr, Kant and Schelling, in some not very remote degree, with the freedom of the Burschen life, and its noblest manifestation—the free outpourings of song; just as in the case of an English intellect, like that of Whewell for instance—masculine and broad in the main, but, on certain subjects, pitifully narrow, we are justified in attributing that narrowness to the contracted system of education of which the English universities are so obstinately enamoured. A newspaper is a mighty engine; but a manual of the history of philosophy is mighty also. The English universities send forth a host of goodly champions, panoplied in Greek, to preach legitimate Church and State bigotry in newspapers and reviews; the German universities send forth their infinitely greater host of honest inquiring thinkers, who own no Church but Charity, whose State is Science, and their citizenship Truth. In the one case, a free country sends forth bigots to preach despotism; in the other case, an enslaved country sends forth philosophers to preach freedom. Thus a wise Providence out of evil brings good, and converts good into evil; here neutralizing the bad, and there making the good nugatory, according to a system of kindly-devised compensations. The German universities are the great many-paged volume that contains the charter of intellectual freedom in Europe. From them sprung Martin Luther; and though the leap from him to a modern Bacchanalian Bursch, roaring a rude song and drinking bad beer, must appear ludicrous, and even disrespectful to the memory of the great champion of religious liberty, yet it is a leap only to English associations. Brother Martin himself was a Bursch, and a jovial one. After theology, he accounted music the most divine of the sciences; and the tuneful Burschen have adopted one of his stanzas as their most familiar motto:—

“Wer liebt nicht Wein, Weiber, und Gesang,
Der bleibt ein Narr sein Lebenlang.”

“Whosoever loves not wine, women, and song, that man is a fool, and remains so to the end of the chapter.” This is the first and the last article of the Burschen creed; and the man who embraces it with an honest and hearty faith, that man is a genuine Bursch, though he should never have either fought a duel or smoked a pipe in his life. Let no man, however, imagine that the admission ticket into this worthy fraternity is easy. To be hearty (flott) is not every man's business; and to love sincerely is always a Christian virtue. It looks, indeed, a little strange when the invitation runs:—

“Such good Christian chums we lack, sir,
Who will drink their latest plack, sir,
Shoes and stockings, and barefoot run
Post to the devil when all is done.”*

But this, like other expressions of the same kind, must be interpreted esoterically; and it only means that a true Bursch will follow his friend penniless to the devil out of sheer love and kindness; which doctrine may possibly not be altogether orthodox, but it certainly does not savour of selfishness or worldly-mindedness. A man who loves wine only, and per se, may be a sot; a man who loves women only, and per se, may be himself a woman; but a man who loves wine, and women, and song, is, in all likelihood, a good fellow—a faithful companion, (ein fideler kerl), a genuine Bursch. The test here is song:—

Böse Menschen haben keine Lieder.”

“BAD MEN HAVE NO SONGS.” So the motto on the title page of one of our Burschen books runs; a most momentous truth, as old, no doubt, as Jubal, the son of Lamech, the father of all such as handle the harp and the organ: and fully proved in after ages by King David, when an evil spirit from the Lord was upon Saul. “Böse Menschen haben keine Lieder.” Malignity, under any shape or character, envy, jealousy, greed, selfishness, cannot sing; the voice of these things is essential discord. A good man only whose pulses beat and whose lungs play cheerfully, can bring forth music. Young men are naturally good-hearted, and youth is naturally full of songs. The German Bursch being καρ εὖλογον, a young man is also καρ εὖλογον, a singer. His drinking and duelling extravagances may force a laugh, perhaps a tear; but in his own truly German region of sweet sounds, he calls forth our most unqualified admiration.

A Burschen song is like the Bursch himself—a thing that every “Philistine” will not understand; but music has this charm above all the sister arts—that they who do not understand it, are nevertheless pleased with it, whether they will or no. By understanding music, we mean here, not the scientific comprehension of sounds, and the laws which guide their succession and combination—for a learned contrapuntist does no more necessarily understand a song, than a learned theologian necessarily understands Christianity: but we mean the practical knowledge and living sympathy with the organic principle of spiritual life, out of which a song is generated—the idea of the song, as the Germans are fond of phrasing it. Now it is manifest that the idea of church music, for instance, exists only in the soul of a devout person, who is prompted by the inspiration of genuine feeling, to this particular method of utterance; and for the true relish and understanding of such music, a pure flow of devotional feeling in the soul is, of course, the first requisite. So, also, in regard to Burschen songs. Here the first condition is that the singer be himself, at least pro hac vice, a genuine Bursch. Free from the Lilliput hamperings of public life, the stilted dignities of office, the small proprieties of place, and the thousand nice pedantries of prim people, he must regenerate the young man again in his soul, (happy if he can do so!) with the full gush of generous sentiment, and the mellow roar of unaffected glee. He must be capable of that most engaging virtue of an honest, healthy heart, which the French call abandon. He must have a sort of mad pleasure in naked truth, even so as to rejoice in it, when slung rudely in his own face. He must sincerely rejoice in downrightness for the sheer sake of downrightness. He must have no leisure for ornament; he must tear in pieces all idle flosculosities; every feeling must at the same time be an action; every thought a blow. Above all things, he must be vigorous and energetic; no sotto voce whisperings, no delicate “treading upon eggs” is tolerated by a Bursch; every sort of noise is legitimate that is not (as sometimes happens) the sign of weakness, not of strength. Delicacy, grace, beauty, taste, are all to be regarded; but in subordination. Even among the Greeks, Aphrodite was not the Queen of Olympus; and with the genuine Bursch, muscle is the first, and the second, and the third thing. It is thus manifest that a Burschen song is a thing of all things in the world most unlike to the great mass of songs, with which our British ears have, of late, been familiarized. These productions are mostly made with a view either to the drawing-room or the concert-saloon; and he who should attempt to adapt anything very stirring or bracing for that atmosphere, would sadly miscalculate. Not even Dibdin's admirable sea songs (though the British tar exemplifies the best qualities of the Bursch) will supply a parallel here. The German Burschen songs,

* “Solche Brüder wollen wir haben,
Die versaufen was sie haben,
Die versaufen strumpf und schuh,
Und laufen baarfüss dem Teufel zu.”

Burschen Song.

both as to words and music, are natural productions perfectly sui generis. They possess a pith and a substantiality, a breadth, mass, and volume; a vigour and a vivacity, a depth also, and sometimes a solemnity peculiar to themselves: but the carving, though bold and spirited, is often rude; their most Cyclopean architecture is still the architecture of young men—yea, mere boys “To the top of GREAT How did it please them to climb,
 And there they built up, without mortar or lime,
 A man on the peak of the crag.”

So their sublime frequently borders on the ridiculous; and yet, like Gargantua, even in their most mad exploits, there is always something about them that may not unfitly be denominated great; and as the wise poet of the lakes learned wisdom from those juvenile architects, so must we also address the German Bursch, when we wish to enjoy his music “Come, light-hearted boys! to the top of the crag,

 And I'll build up a giant with you.”

In this spirit, we may venture to join the chorus of a jocund Commers-Lied;—quite dramatically, as Murray plays Newman Noggs, without a shirt on his back; and altogether unconscious that such persons as Boileau, or Blair, or Mrs Hannah More ever existed in the world.

We presume that such of our readers as may take any interest in Burschen melodies know already what a Bursch is, and have some general ideas on the habits and manners of the German students. The subject of German universities has been frequently before the public of late; and the peculiarities of the Burschen life have not escaped the observation of English travellers, whose known patriotism is never slow to seize upon the ludicrous side of all that is foreign. Mr Russell has been severe enough on the swaggering “renowners” of Jena. He allows, however, that they are hard students as well as hard drinkers, and fails not (with Mephistopheles in Faust) to commend the conscientious diligence with which they are wont to take down the Professor's “words in writing,

 As if the Holy Spirit were inditing.”

A laugh, so qualified, may be tolerated by the most enthusiastic friend of the Burschen; while he who wishes to see the portrait drawn by more kindly hands, may consult the admirable article of The London and Westminster Review, above quoted. Had it not been for that article, we should have thought it our duty on the present occasion to enter at some length into the details of Burschen life; but actum agere is our detestation. The songs, moreover, are, for the most part, the best comment to themselves; and, when any special explanation may seem necessary, we shall not fail to supply it.

One observation we must prefix, that the songs are, for the most part, sung with the accompaniment of a full vocal chorus; the want of which no music-craft can fully supply. It is the praise of Germany, indeed, in all departments of music, to have cultivated choral singing with peculiar care. Luther was a singing boy at Eisleben; and Professor Zelter's “Sing-Academie” at Berlin was famous over Europe. The Burschen have few songs without a chorus; this accompaniment lies, indeed, in the very nature of social music; and, besides this, there is often a dramatic distribution of parts, with a freshness and raciness thence resulting, that no tame singing, however sweet, and no formal singing, however grand, can compensate.

Another remark we have to make is this:—We wish for no mere readers. The custom of reading songs is a piece of modern Vandalism which Æschylus and Pindar could not have understood; it is the melody specially that we have to do with, and the living triumph of the spirit of glee in the soul of a Bursch. The Burschen songs present very little of what is commonly called poetry. We, individually, maintain that they are instinct with the soul of true poetry—health, and vigour, and cheerfulness; they are, moreover, real and natural—a living growth, and inestimably precious, as Carlyle somewhere preaches, because they are true. So also Goethe said—“Of poetry snapped out of the air, (aus der Luft gegriffen,) I make no account.”—(See Eckermann.) But the old French ideas still haunt us in some things; and the Burschen songs can expect no great commendation from critics of the kid-glove school. This, however, is a matter of small moment. We do not swear by the word of any of these loose effusions. If we can introduce the airs into English currency, we shall consider ourselves sufficiently happy. There are not wanting men of pith and vigour in merry England to make words for them, more suited to the genius of John Bull, and overflowing with genuine English hilarity and fun. The beauty of German songs, generally, consists more in their honesty than in their brilliancy; and we suspect that even in the rough romping line, Dr M'Ginn will beat any Bursch that ever penned stanza. But their natural words belong to them, in the first place. No lover of things German, no admirer of nature and consistency, would like to see a divorce; and for what we shall attempt to do in the delicate department of “oversetting,” we shall claim every legitimate indulgence.

We commence, most properly, with a fine allegro air, in which the Bursch draws his own portrait at full length, with the inliest and most comfortable self-satisfaction. The outer man is described in that full flicker of Burschen glory, now, alas! seen no more. The huge hat with waving plume is now exchanged for an humble cap or bonnet (Mütze;) which, however, in 1829, when the present reporter was a Bursch, still shewed in appropriate lace and tassil the colours of the Landsmannschaft. The sword also, the Burschen's pride, is now never seen publicly; it is, however, (or was, at the period referred to,) as active as ever in “the house of honour,” on the worthy “fighting floor;” perhaps, like other things both bad and good, the more rigorously it is interdicted, the more vigorously it vegetates.

DER BURSCH VON AECHEM SCHROT UND KORN.—Melody I.

Solo. Tutti.

The Ger-man Bursch of ge-nu-ine cut, A rov-ing boy is he; Val-le-ri! A rov-ing boy is he. Val-le-ra! His boot is spurred, and on his hat A wav-ing plume you see, Val-le-ri, A wav-ing plume you see.

The German Bursch, of genuine cut,
A roving boy is he;
His boot 's well spurred, and on his hat
The plume waves merrily.

Upon his swashing hat he wears
The colours of his clan;*
And whoso scoffs his colours, dares
The spirit of a man.

The German Bursch, where'er he goes,
He wears the Burschen's pride,
The sword that swings, against all foes,
In terror from his side.

His heavy boot rings merrily,
While through the street he goes;
And from his heel, in majesty,
A shower of fire he sows.

What though his elbow bare you spy?
What though a rent appear?
He's still the roving roystering boy,
The Bursch whom all revere.

What prig precise may cross his way,
What prim and perfumed beau—
Beware, lest with his stick he lay
Thy paint and paper low!

For friends his honest heart beats warm—
A friend in need is he;
For friends he wields the brawny arm,
And faces death with glee.

Who ever saw him turn and flee
From battle of the brave?
The Bursch will scorn the kingdom's fee
That buys a traitor knave.

He thunders through the battle's shock;
His shining sword he shews;
And, stroke on stroke, he drives, like smoke,
The blank confounded foes.

Cheerly he meets the evil day;
He fears nor threat nor ban;
He fronts the host of hell, and they Retreat before a Man!

And when he hears of Hermann's fame,
His German blood doth burn;
Be worthy, German, of the name
That made proud Cæsar mourn!

And while the Rhenish cup he drains,
A German soul feels he;
A giant's strength leaps in his veins—
The German Bursch is free!

And when he feels the weight of woes,
He takes his pipe so rare;
And, as the knaster fumes and glows,
He puffs away dull care.

The German Bursch lives sans façon;
Though you may think him rude,
'Tis but the bark the tree puts on:
Trust me his heart is good.

He wishes to all maidens gay
Long life and happy days;
He praises them in every lay
As much as he can praise.

* The German students club themselves into companies called "Landmannschaften," according to the district from which they come, and the races to which they belong; so our Scottish students divide themselves into "nations" for the election of a Rector. The word "clan," though by no means an accurate translation of "Landmannschaft," seems, for poetical purposes at least, as good a word as our language presents.

He praises every German man
Who speaks the truth he feels ;
And may he know the Devil's ban
Who glozes or conceals.

Now, all the mugs are empty, boys,
The flagons all are full ;
Then let us crown this cup, brave boys,
To Bursch and Burschen rule.

Now pour the merry Bacchus-blood
Into the empty can ;
Drink to our noble brotherhood,
Drink every man his clan.

N—— is my fatherland,
The ribbon  I wear ;
I will defend it, sword in hand,
Blaspheme the name who dare !

Our next specimen brims over with brilliant Burschikosity ; and the beer-bottle lords it away.

The third air, "Gaudeamus igitur," is pretty generally known. It is the same that is sung to the famous robber song in Schiller—"Ein freies Leben führen wir." The song is of genuine University cut; and with the expectation that it may be often sung both in Edinburgh and Oxford, we give also, in this case, the original words, which are Latin. The honest denunciation of the last verse is inimitable:

PEREAT DIABOLUS!

Martin Luther might have said it! We have, in our English version, put an additional syllable into the last bar of each part; this may cover, in some degree, the want of full vocality in the English language, as compared with the Latin; but as the music has a double note, the variation is of no consequence.

GAUDEAMUS Igitur.—Melody III.

Andante.

Gau-de-a-mus, Burs-chen brave! Gau-de-a-mus while we may! When bright youth no more jo-cose is, When dull age no more mo-rose is, We shall sleep be-neath the clay, We shall sleep be-neath the clay.

Gaudeamus, Burschen brave,
Gaudeamus, while we may;
 When bright youth no more jocose is,
 When dull age no more morose is,
 We shall sleep beneath the clay!
 Where be they who lived of yore,
 Greeting, as we greet, the day?
 Ask great Jove, on throne supernal—
 Pluto ask, in caves infernal—
 Where be they? O where be they?
 Short is life; how fleet the past!
 Future time more fleet will flow!
 When the Fates command our flitting,
 Least expected, most unfitting,
 Old and young must walk below.
 Then here 's to the University!
 Fill a bright cup brimming o'er!
 Here 's to all the learned Professors,
 Chancellors, Rectors, and Assessors,
 May they flourish evermore!

Here 's to maidens fair and frank!
 Pour the bright wine, freely pour!
 Here 's to matrons, easy, cheerful,
 Mothers good, and housewives careful,
 Wise to gather, wise to store.
 Here 's to Freedom!—holy name!
 Hermann! Freedom! Fatherland!
 Here 's to the man whose blood is up high,
 Here 's to the Bursch who crowns his cup high,
 For his German Fatherland!
 Here 's to all the good and great!
 Every rank, and every class;
 Here 's to every true Mænas
 Shielding poets soaring tenuis
 To the proud peak of Parnass!
 Perish triste and gloomy looks!
 Perish all who blame the Bursch!
 Perish the ancient old black Devil!
 Perish each base thought uncivil
 To the noble name of Bursch!

GAUDEAMUS IGITUR.

SKETCHES OF LIFE AND MANNERS, FROM THE AUTOBIOGRAPHY OF AN ENGLISH OPIUM-EATER.

THE SARACEN'S HEAD.

My first visit to the Wordsworths had been made in November, 1807; but, on that occasion, from the necessity of saving the Michaelmas term at Oxford, for which I had barely left myself time, I stayed only one week. On the last day, I witnessed a scene, the first and the last of its kind that ever I did witness, almost too trivial to mention, except for the sake of shewing what things occur in the realities of experience which a novelist could not venture to imagine. Wordsworth and his sister were under an engagement of some standing to dine on that day with a literary lady about four miles distant; and, as the southern mail, which I was to catch at a distance of eighteen miles, would not pass that point until long after midnight, Miss Wordsworth proposed that, rather than pass my time at an inn, I should join the dinner party; a proposal rather more suitable to her own fervent and hospitable temper, than to the habits of our hostess, who must (from what I came to know of her in after years) have looked upon me as an intruder. Something had reached Miss Wordsworth of her penurious ménage, but nothing that approached the truth. I was presented to the lady, whom we found a perfect bas bleu of a very commonplace order, but having some other accomplishments beyond her slender acquaintance with literature. Our party consisted of six—our hostess, who might be fifty years of age; a pretty timid young woman, who was there in the character of a humble friend; some stranger or other, the Wordsworths, and myself. The dinner was the very humblest and simplest I had ever seen—in that there was nothing to offend—I did not then know that the lady was very rich—but also it was flagrantly insufficient in quantity. Dinner, however, proceeded; when, without any removals, in came a kind of second course, in the shape of a solitary pheasant. This, in a cold manner, she asked me to try; but we, in our humility, declined for the present; and also in mere good-nature, not wishing to expose too palpably the insufficiency of her dinner. May I die the death of a traitor, if she did not proceed, without further question to any one of us, (and as to the poor young companion, no form of even invitation was conceded to her,) and, in the eyes of us all, ate up the whole bird, from alpha to omega. Upon my honour, I thought to myself, this is a scene I would not have missed. It is well to know the possibilities of human nature. Could she have a bet depending on the issue, and would she explain all to us as soon as she had won her wager? Alas! no explanation ever came, except, indeed, that afterwards her character, put en evidence upon a score of occasions, too satisfactorily explained everything. No; it was, as Mr Coleridge expresses it, a psychological curiosity—a hollow thing—and only once matched in all the course of my reading, in or out of romances; but that once, I grieve to say it, was by a king, and a sort of hero. The Duchess of Marlborough it is, who reports the shocking anecdote of William III., that actually Prince Anne, his future wife, durst not take any of the green peas brought to the dinner table, when that vegetable happened to be as yet scarce and premature. There was a gentleman! And such a lady had we for our hostess. However, we all observed a suitable gravity; but afterwards, when we left the house, the remembrance affected us differently: Miss Wordsworth laughed with undissembled glee; but Wordsworth thought it too grave a matter for laughing—he was thoroughly disgusted; and said repeatedly, a person cannot be honest, positively not honest, who is capable of such an act. The lady is dead, and I shall not mention her name: she lived only to gratify her selfish propensities; and two little anecdotes may shew the outrageous character of her meanness. I was now on the debtor side of her dinner account, and, therefore, in a future year she readily accepted an invitation to come and dine with me at my cottage. But, on a subsequent occasion, when I was to have a few literary people at dinner, whom I knew that she greatly wished to meet, she positively replied thus:—"No; I have already come with my young lady to dine with you; that puts me on the wrong side by one; now if I were to come again, as I cannot leave Miss —— behind, I shall then be on the wrong side by three; and that is more than I could find opportunities to repay before I go up to London for the winter."—"Very well," I said, "give me 3s., and that will settle the account." She laughed, but positively persisted in not coming until after dinner, notwithstanding she had to drive a distance of ten miles. The other anecdote is worse. She was exceedingly careful of her health; and not thinking it healthy to drive about in a close carriage, which, besides, could not have suited the narrow mountain tracks, to which her sketching habits attracted her, she shut up her town carriage for the summer, and jobbed some little open car. Being a very large woman, and, moreover, a masculine woman, with a bronzed complexion, and always choosing to wear, at night, a turban, round hair that was as black as that of the "Moors of Malabar," she presented an exact likeness of a Saracen's Head, as painted over inn doors; whilst the timid and delicate young lady, by her side, looked like "dejected Pity" at the side of "Revenge," when assuming the war-denouncing trumpet. Some Oxonians and Cantabæ, who, at different times, were in the habit of meeting this oddly assorted party in all nooks of the country, used to move the question, whether the poor horse or the young lady had the worst of it. At length the matter was decided: the horse was fast going off this sublunary stage; and the Saracen's Head was told as much, and with this little addition—that his death was owing inter alia to starvation. Her answer was remarkable:—"But, my dear madam, that is his master's fault; I pay so much a-day—he is to keep the horse." That might be, but still the horse was dying—and dying in the way stated. The Saracen's Head persisted in using him under those circumstances—such was her "bond"—and, in a short time, the horse actually died. Yes, the horse died—and died of starvation—or at least of an illness caused originally by starvation; for so said, not merely the whole population of the little neighbouring town, but also the surgeon. Not long after, however, the lady, the Saracen's Head, died herself; but, I fear, not of starvation; for, though something like it did prevail at her table, she prudently reserved it all for her guests; in fact, I never heard of such vigilant care, and so much laudable exertion, applied to the promotion of health: yet all failed, and in a degree which confounded people's speculations upon the subject—for she did not live much beyond sixty; whereas everybody supposed that the management of her physical system entitled her to outwear a century. Perhaps the prayers of horses might avail to order it otherwise. But the singular thing about this lady's mixed and contradictory character was—that, in London and Bath, where her peculiar habits of life were naturally less accurately known, she maintained the reputation of one who united the accomplishments of literature and art with a remarkable depth of sensibility, and a most amiable readiness to enter into the distresses of her friends, by sympathy the most cordial, and consolation the most delicate. More than once I have seen her name recorded in printed books, and attended with praises that tended to this effect. I have seen letters also, from a lady in deep affliction, which spoke of the Saracen's Head as having paid her the first visit from which she drew any effectual consolation. Such are the erroneous impressions conveyed by biographical memoirs; or, which is a more charitable construction of the case, such are the inconsistencies of the human heart! And certainly there was one fact, even in her Westmoreland life, that did lend some countenance to the southern picture of her amiableness—and this lay in the cheerfulness with which she gave up her time (time, but not much of her redundant money) to the promotion of the charitable schemes set on foot by the neighbouring ladies; sometimes for the education of poor children, sometimes for the visiting of the sick, &c., &c. I have heard several of those ladies express their gratitude for her exertions, and declare that she was about their best member. But their horror was undisguised when the weekly committee came, by rotation, to hold its sittings at her little villa; for, as the business occupied them frequently from eleven o'clock in the forenoon to a late dinner hour, and as many of them had a fifteen or twenty miles' drive, they needed some refreshments: but these were, of course, a "great idea" at the Saracen's Head; since, according to the epigram which illustrates the maxim of Tacitus, that omne ignotum pro magnifico, and, applying it to the case of a miser's horse, terminates by saying, "What vast ideas must he have of oats!"—upon the same principle, these poor ladies, on these fatal committee days, never failed to form most exaggerated ideas of bread, butter, and wine. And at length, some more intrepid than the rest, began to carry biscuits in their muffs, and, with the conscious tremors of school girls, (profiting by the absence of the mistress, but momentarily expecting detection,) they employed some casual absence of their unhostly hostess in distributing and eating their hidden "viaticum." However, it must be acknowledged, that time and exertion, and the sacrifice of more selfish pleasures during the penance at the school, were, after all, real indications of kindness to her fellow-creatures; and, as I wish to part in peace, even with the Saracen's Head, I have reserved this anecdote to the last; for it is painful to have lived on terms of good nature, and exchanging civilities, with any human being, of whom one can report absolutely no good thing: and I sympathize heartily with that indulgent person of whom it is somewhere recorded, that upon an occasion when the death of a man happened to be mentioned, who was unanimously pronounced a wretch without one good quality, "monstrum nullâ virtute redemptum," he ventured, however, at last, in a deprecatory tone to say—"Well, he did whistle beautifully, at any rate."

Talking of "whistling," reminds me to return from my digression; for on that night, the 12th of November, 1807, and the last of my visits to the Wordsworths, I took leave of them in the inn at Ambleside, about ten at night; and the post-chaise in which I crossed the country to catch the mail, was driven by a postillion who whistled so delightfully, that, for the first time in my life, I became aware of the prodigious powers which are lodged potentially in so despised a function of the vocal organs. For the whole of the long ascent up Orrest Head, which obliged him to walk his horses for a full half-mile, he made the woods of Windermere ring with the canorous sweetness of his half flute half clarionet music; but, in fact, the subtle melody of the effect placed it in power far beyond either flute or clarionet. A year or two afterwards, I heard a fellow-servant of this same postillion's, a black, play with equal superiority of effect upon the jew's harp; making that, which in most hands is a mere monotonous jarring, a dull reverberating vibration, into a delightful lyre of no inconsiderable compass. We have since heard of, some of us have heard, the chinchopper. Within the last hundred years, we have had the Æolian harp, (first mentioned and described in the "Castle of Indolence," which I think was first published entire about 1738;) then the musical glasses; then the celestina, to represent the music of the spheres, introduced by Mr Walker, or some other lecturing astronomer; and many another fine effect obtained from trivial means. But, at this moment, I recollect a performance perhaps more astonishing than any of them: a Mr Worgman, who had very good introductions, and very general ones, (for he was to be met within a few months in every part of the island,) used to accompany himself on the piano, weaving extempore long tissues of impassioned music, that were called his own, but which, in fact, were all the better for not being such, or at least for continually embodying passages from Handel and Pergolesi. To this substratum of the instrumental music, he contrived to adapt some unaccountable and indescribable choral accompaniment, a pomp of sound, a tempestuous blair of harmony ascending in clouds, not from any one, but apparently from a band of Mr Worgman's; for sometimes it was a trumpet, sometimes a kettle-drum, sometimes a cymbal, sometimes a bassoon, and sometimes it was all of these at once.

"And now 'twas like all instruments;
And now it was a flute;
And now it was an angel's voice,
That maketh the heavens be mute."

In this case, I presume, that ventriloquism must have had something to do with the effect; but whatever it were, the power varied greatly with the state of his spirits, or with some other fluctuating causes in the animal economy. However, the result of all these experiences is, that I shall never more be surprised at any musical effects, the very greatest, drawn from whatever inconsiderable or apparently inadequate means; not even if the butcher's instrument, the marrow-bones and cleaver, or any of those culinary instruments so pleasantly treated by Addison in the "Spectator," such as the kitchen dresser and thumb, the tongs and shovel, the pepper and-salt box, should be exalted, by some immortal butcher or inspired scullion, into a sublime harp, dulcimer, or lute, capable of wooing St Cecilia to listen, able even

"To raise a mortal to the skies,
Or draw an angel down."

That night, as I was passing under the grounds of Elleray, then belonging to a Westmoreland "statesman," a thought struck me, that I was now traversing a road with which, as yet, I was scarcely at all acquainted, but which, in years to come, might perhaps be as familiar to my eye as the rooms of my own house; and possibly that I might traverse them in company with faces as yet not even seen by me, but in those future years dearer than any which I had yet known. In this prophetic glimpse there was nothing very marvellous; for what could be more natural than that I should come to reside in the neighbourhood of the Wordsworths, and that this might lead to my forming connexions in a country which I should consequently come to know so well? I did not, however, anticipate so definitely and circumstantially as all this; but generally I had a dim presentiment that here, on this very road, I should often pass, and in company that now, not even conjecturally delineated or drawn out of the utter darkness in which they were as yet reposing, would hereafter plant memories in my heart, the last that will fade from it in the hour of death. Here, afterwards, at this very spot, or a little above it, but on this very estate, which, from local peculiarities of ground, and of sudden angles, was peculiarly kenspeck, i. e. easy of recognition, and could have been challenged and identified at any distance of years—here afterwards lived Professor Wilson, the only very intimate male friend I have had—here, too, it was, my M., that, in long years afterwards, through many a score of nights—nights often dark as Erebus, and amidst thunders and lightnings the most sublime—we descended at twelve, one, and two o'clock at night, speeding from Kendal to our distant home, twenty miles away. Thou wert at present a child not nine years old, nor had I seen thy face, nor heard thy name. But within nine years from that same night, thou wert seated by my side ;—and, thenceforwards, through a period of fourteen years, how often did we two descend, hand locked in hand, and thinking of things to come, at a pace of hurricane ; whilst all the sleeping woods about us re-echoed the uproar of trampling hoofs and groaning wheels. Duly as we mounted the crest of Orrest Head, mechanically and of themselves almost, and spontaneously, without need of voice or spur, according to Westmoreland usage, the horses flew off into a gallop, like the pace of a swallow :^{*} it was a rail-road pace that we ever maintained ; objects were descried far a-head in one moment, and in the next were crowding into the rear. Three miles and a-half did this storm-flight continue, for so long the descent lasted. Then for many a mile, over undulating ground, did we ultimately creep and fly, until again a long precipitous movement, again a storm-gallop, that hardly suffered the feet to touch the ground, gave warning that we drew near to that beloved cottage ; warning to us, warning to them—

——— “ the silence that is here
Is of the grave, and of austere
But happy feelings of the dead.”

Sometimes the nights were bright with cloudless moonlight, and of that awful breathless quiet which often broods over vales that are peculiarly landlocked, and which is, or seems to^{*} be, so much more expressive of a solemn hush and a Sabbath-like rest from the labours of nature, than I remember to have experienced in flat countries :—

“ It is not quiet—is not peace—
But something deeper far than these.”

And on such nights it was no sentimental refinement, but a sincere and hearty feeling, that, in wheeling past the village churchyard of Stavely, something like an outrage seemed offered to the sanctity of its graves, by the uproar of our career. Sometimes the nights were of that pitchy darkness which is more palpable and unfathomable wherever hills intercept the gleaming of light which otherwise is usually seen to linger about the horizon in the northern quarter ; and then arose in perfection that striking effect, when the glare of lamps searches for one moment every dark recess of the thickest, forces them into sudden, almost day-light revelation, only to leave them within the twinkling of the eye in darkness more profound ; making them, like the snow-flakes falling upon a cataract, “ one moment bright, then gone for ever.” But, dark or moonlight alike, in every instance throughout so long a course of years, the road was entirely our own for the whole twenty miles. After nine o'clock, not many people are abroad ; after ten, absolutely none, upon the roads of Westmoreland ; a circumstance which gives a peculiar solemnity to a traveller's route amongst these quiet valleys upon a summer evening of latter May, of June, or early July ; since, in a latitude so much higher than that of London, broad day light prevails to an hour long after nine. Nowhere is the holiness of vesper hours more deeply felt. And now, in 1839, from all these flying journeys and their stinging remembrances, hardly a wreck survives of what composed their living equipage : the men who chiefly drove in those days (for I have ascertained it) are gone ; the horses are gone ; darkness rests upon all, except myself. I, who is me ! am the solitary survivor from scenes that now seem to me as fugitive as the flying lights from our lamps as they shot into the forest recesses. God forbid that on such a theme I should seem to affect sentimentalism. It is from overmastering recollections that I look back on those distant days ; and chiefly I have suffered myself to give way before the impulse that haunts me, of reverting to those bitter, bitter thoughts, in order to notice one singular waywardness or caprice (as it might seem) incident to the situation, which, I doubt not, besieges many more people than myself : it is, that I find a more poignant suffering, a pang more searching, in going back, not to those enjoyments themselves, and the days when they were within my power, but to times anterior, when as yet they did not exist ; nay, when some who were chiefly concerned in them as parties, had not even been born. No night, I might almost say, of my whole life, remains so profoundly, painfully, and pathetically imprinted upon my remembrance, as this very one, on which I tried, prelusively, as it were, that same road in solitude, and lulled by the sweet carolings of the postillion, which, after an interval of ten years, and through a period of more than equal duration, it was destined that I should so often traverse in circumstances of happiness too radiant, that for me are burned out for ever. Coleridge told me of a similar case that had fallen within his knowledge, and the impassioned expression which the feelings belonging to it drew from a servant woman at Keswick :—She had nursed some boy, either of his or of Mr Southey's ; the boy had lived apart from the rest of the family, secluded with his nurse in her cottage ; she was doatingly fond of him ; lived, in short, by him as well as for him ; and nearly ten years of her life had been exalted into one golden dream by his companionship. At length came the day which severed the connexion ; and she, in the anguish of the separation, bewailing her future loneliness, and knowing too well that education and the world, if it left him some kind remembrances of her, never could restore him to her arms the same fond loving boy that felt no shame in surrendering his whole heart to caressing and being caressed, did not revert to any day or season of her ten years' happiness, but went back to the very day of his arrival, a particular Thursday, and to an hour when, as yet, she had not seen him, exclaiming—

^{*} It may be supposed not literally, for the swallow (or at least that species called the Swift,) has been known to fly at the rate of 300 miles an hour. Very probably, however, this pace was not deduced from an entire hour's performance, but estimated by proportion from a flight of one or two minutes. An interesting anecdote is told by the gentleman (I believe the Rev. E. Stanley) who described in Blackwood's Magazine the opening of the earliest English railway—viz. that a bird (snipe was it, or field-fare, or plover ?) ran, or rather flew, a race with the engine for three or four miles, until finding itself likely to be beaten, it then suddenly wheeled away into the moors.

“O that Thursday! O that it could come back! that Thursday when the chaise-wheels were ringing in the streets of Keswick; when yet I had not seen his bonny face; but when he was coming!”

Ay, reader, all this may sound foolishness to you, that perhaps never had a heartach, or that may have all your blessings to come. But now let me return to my narrative:—After about twelve months' interval, and therefore again in November, but November of the year 1808, I repeated my visit to Wordsworth, and upon a longer scale. I found him removed from his cottage to a house of considerable size, about three-quarters of a mile distant, called Allan Bank. This house had been very recently erected, at an expense of about £1500, by a gentleman from Liverpool, a merchant, and also a lawyer in some department or other. It was not yet completely finished; and an odd accident was reported to me as having befallen it in its earliest stage. The walls had been finished, and this event was to be celebrated at the village inn with an ovation, previously to the triumph that would follow on the roof-raising. The workmen had all housed themselves at the Red Lion, and were beginning their carouse, when up rode a traveller, who brought them the unseasonable news, that, whilst riding along the vale, he had beheld the downfall of the whole building. Out the men rushed, hoping that this might be a hoax; but too surely they found his report true, and their own festival premature. A little malice mingled unavoidably with the laughter of the Dalesmen; for it happened that the Liverpool gentleman had offered a sort of insult to the native artists, by bringing down both masons and carpenters from his own town: an unwise plan, for they were necessarily unacquainted with many points of local skill; and it was to some ignorance in their mode of laying the stones that the accident was due. The house had one or two capital defects—it was cold, damp, and, to all appearance, incurably smoky. Upon this latter defect, by the way, Wordsworth founded a claim, not for diminution of rent, but absolutely for entire immunity from any rent at all. It was truly comical to hear him argue the point with the Liverpool proprietor, Mr C. He went on dilating on the hardship of living in such a house; of the injury, or suffering at least, sustained by the eyes; until, at last, he had drawn a picture of himself as a very ill-used man; and I seriously expected to hear him sum up by demanding a round sum for damages. Mr C. was a very good-natured man, calm, and gentlemanlike in his manners. He had also a considerable respect for Wordsworth, derived, it may be supposed, not from his writings, but from the authority (which many more besides him could not resist) of his conversation. However, he looked grave and perplexed. Nor do I know how the matter ended; but I mention it as an illustration of Wordsworth's keen spirit of business. Whilst foolish people supposed him a mere honeyed sentimentalist, speaking only in zephyrs and bucolics, he was in fact a somewhat hard pursuer of what he thought fair advantages.

In the February which followed, I left Allan Bank; but upon Miss Wordsworth's happening to volunteer the task of furnishing for my use the cottage so recently occupied by her brother's family, I took it upon a seven years' lease. And thus it happened—this I mean was the mode of it, (for, at any rate, I should have settled somewhere in the country,) that I became a resident in Grasmere.

ARTISANS' OUT-DOOR HYMN

BY EBENEZER ELLIOTT.

WHEN Stuart reign'd, God's people fled,
Chased like the helpless hunted hare;
But, kneeling on the mountain's head,
There sought the Lord, and found him there.

Lord! we too suffer; we too pray
That thou wilt guide our steps aright;
And bless this day—till'd Labour's day—
And fill our souls with heavenly light.

For failing bread, six days in seven
We till the black town's dust and gloom;
But here we drink the breath of heaven,
And here to pray the poor have room.

The stately temple, built with hands,
Throws wide its doors to pomp and pride;
But in the porch their beadle staid,
And thrusts the child of toil aside.

Therefore we seek the daisied plain,
Or climb thy hills to touch thy feet;
There, far from splendour's heartless fane,
Thy weary sons and daughters meet.

Is it a crime to tell thee here,
That here the sorely-tried are met;
To seek thy face, and find thee near;
And on thy rock our feet to set?

Where, wheeling wide, the plover flies;
Where sings the woodlark on the tree.
Beneath the silence of thy skies,
Is it a crime to worship thee?

We waited long, and sought thee, Lord,
Content to toil, but not to pine;
And with the weapons of thy Word
Alone assail'd our foes and thine.

Thy truth and thee we bade them fear:
They spurn thy truth, and mock our moan!
Thy counsels, Lord, they will not hear,
And thou hast left them to their own.*

THEOPHRASTUS REDIVIVUS.

BY TOBY ALISPY.

NO. I.—THE CABINET MINISTRESS.

A POPULAR periodical, of which we have had occasion to speak elsewhere,* and a novelist whose works we have also found occasion to consider, have recently attempted the delineation of a character common to all civilized ages and countries, and differing in each—the Cabinet Minister; and if their sketches are good for anything, there is certainly as much difference to be quoted between the Wolseys, Burleighs, Walpoles, Chathams of other times, and their successors of the nineteenth century, as between Sully, Richelieu, and Monsieur Thiers.

But there is one portion of the Cabinet Minister—I. e., his better-half—that still remains to be delineated; an anomalous individual, to whom the nation supplies “a local habitation,” and for whom henceforward we shall supply “a name.” Since there is no more reason why “Ambassador” should have its feminine in the vernacular than “Minister,” we propose henceforward to follow the example of the Germans, in whose provincial towns you may hear announced, “Mrs Deputy Sub-Inspectress of the Royal and Imperial Mines and Forests;” or “Mrs Upper Land-Stewardess of the Parochial District of so-and-so.”

The Cabinet Ministress is, in our opinion, an ill-used person, considering the large portion of the business of the State gratuitously harnessed upon her fair shoulders. The Cabinet Ministress is, in fact, the great unpaid—sans salary, sans perquisites, sans patronage, sans everything—yet expected to be the obedient humble servant of the throne and the public every hour of the day—every day in the year, from eight o'clock in the morning till six the morning following—from the 1st of January to the 31st of December. The Cabinet Ministress has no quarter, and no quarter-day. She works like a slave; and, if refractory, is reminded, like other slaves, that the hour of emancipation will be the hour of her ruin; that it is Lombard Street to a China orange—that she must either be the Cabinet Ministress and a drudge, or plain Lady Titmouse and a nothing.

We might have hesitated to draw public attention towards a character apparently of a private nature, were it not that our present Premier and his predecessor are widowers. No personality can be imputed. The kind-hearted being who should be now enjoying the honours and exercising the labours of Premièreship is at rest. “After life’s fitful fever she sleeps well;” and the female history of Downing Street, for once, presents a blank. The interregnum is, at least, favourable to the delineation of this unnatural taskwork.

“Grief and pain,

That has been, and may be again.”

In the first place, the Cabinet Ministress has to endure, by ricochet, all the ill-humour of the throne. Whenever the Premier has shewn himself stubborn with the King, his master, concerning a new war, new tax, new favourite, new antipathy—concerning secret supplies or public animosities—suggested by the voice of royalty, (not the less absolute for being still and small,) the queen-consort thinks it necessary to mark her resentment to the Première. It is amazing in how many modes this may be effected! The French have taught us three hundred and sixty-five ways to dress eggs. The number of fashions in which sovereignty can trick up its displeasures is more than double! It speaks volumes in a single glance, and libraries in a curtsy; or, by omitting either, can “Kill, kill, kill, kill,” as ruthlessly as Lear. When the Cabinet Ministress makes her appearance at Court, to perform her official ko-too, the aspect of royalty is watched by all present, to ascertain the temperature of her welcome; and, according as that august countenance freezes or thaws, those of the titled mob are bright or sinister. The stability of the administration is opined upon, according to the indications of the barometer of that variable atmosphere, the breath of kings. The Cabinet Ministress is invited to share the bread and salt of the royal table; and those who know not what duplicity is in Courts, predict that all must be safe: or she is coldly looked upon; and not a civil syllable is uttered of inquiry after her sick children or gouty father; and people go and sell out of the stocks, not dreaming how many masks are assumed to lead astray the surmises of political antagonism.

Another of the peines fortes et dures sustained by Cabinet Ministresses, is that of doing the honours of the country to illustrious foreigners, not quite grand enough to be inmates of the palace, and too grand to be the guests of the commonality. These great unknowns, usually speaking no language but their own, must be chaperoned to St Paul’s, the Abbey, the Tower, like other country cousins; they must be escorted to the opera, accompanied to Almacks, presented at Court. No matter whether the august visitor, flung with other burthens on the shoulders of the Foreign Office, be the Duchess of Hesse Schweinburg Pigstyhausen, or Quam Sham Heblez Fudgeroo, Princess Royal of the Sandwich Islands. Lady Downing Street must take care that her Royal or Serene Highness’s Sauerkraut, or Sandwich of raw veal, is suitably adjusted; that her Royal or Serene Highness's Court plume, or jacket of peacock's feathers, come home in due time from the plumasier; and should her Royal or Serene Highness be summoned to Bow Street, for fustigating her maids of honour, or carbonadoing a child for luncheon, the Cabinet Ministress is required to explain to her that she is in the wrong box, and that nothing enormous can be done in England without "an order from the magistrates."

The Cabinet Ministress must possess a half-horse, half-alligator constitution. She must be untirable as the pen of Mr Historiographer James—elastic as the conscience of Lord Somebody, who shall be nameless. She must be ready to rattle in an hour and twenty minutes to Windsor—hail, rain, or shine—whether on the eve of her confinement, or just recovering from the same—whenever honoured with a summons to eat a slice of the royal mutton, or take up a stitch in the royal chain-stitch. She must be insensible to the perils and dangers of damp beds or smokey chimneys, when following the Court; and, should the Pavilion be the favourite toy of the reign, must on no account find the searching air of Brighton too keen for her. Its rough visiting, like that of custom-house officers on landing from France, is a sacrifice due to the interests of Government.

Her appetite must be as untirable as her limbs. However squeamish by nature, she must be ready to swallow turtle and venison à discrétion, whenever invited to figure at public dinners. "The Cabinet Ministers and their ladies" are required to be in readiness whenever the city of London feasts the city of Westminster, cramming its aldermen and custards down the throats of the dainty dames of May Fair. Wherever new bridges, railroads, or docks are opened to the public, hundred-and-twenty gun ships launched, statues inaugurated, or other grand national events solemnized with eating and drinking, the Cabinet Ministress must hob and nob with the local authorities, in order to have it supposed by the rest of the world that Government has had a finger in the pie. If a tall showy woman, doing honour to her vocation, ten to one but the Cabinet Ministress will be asked to lay the first stone of a church, bridge, arch, college, lunatic asylum, or other national monument—or to christen the ship with a bottle of pale sherry—or to hazard her life by being the first to skim along the new railroad, or by supporting, for three consecutive hours, the weighty politeness of the Lord Mayor. But all this she must endure with smiling amenity. Whatever solemnities may take place during her husband's administration—whether the thermometer be three degrees below freezing point, or at ninety-two degrees in the shade—she must be able to stand half-a-dozen hours on a chilly pavement without a sneeze, or in the broiling sunshine without fainting or a coup de soleil. A parasol, fleecy hosiery, and the inborn strength of a Cabinet Ministress, will get her through her miseries. A bilious fever, caught at the Mansion House, would be an insult to the Chief Magistrate of the city of London; and were she to complain of a fit of the rheumatism as the result of some royal funeral, or banquet in a barge, the attention of Parliament might, perhaps, be called to her delinquency by some factious Opposition Member.

But it is not alone to the festivals of the home department poor Lady Downing Street is required to do justice. Besides eating slices of a raw baron of beef in the Egyptian Hall, or an unctuous matelotte of eels, that look like segments of a boa constrictor, swanhoping at eel-pie island, the Cabinet Ministress is expected to assist in the celebration of all the birthdays of all the sovereigns in Europe—from the youthful Queen of the Peninsula to the undying one, the veteran King of Sweden. She must not only have the almanac of Saxe Gotha at her fingers' ends, but be prepared to munch her way through it, as a promising child eats through its gingerbread alphabet. She must imbibe furlongs of maccaroni with the Ambassador of the Two Sicilies on the 12th of January; and swallow six ounces of caviar without wincing, with their Muscovite Excellencies on the 6th of July; nay, now that all Mussulman prejudices are abolished, it is probable that she may hereafter have to pull a pillau to pieces with her fingers at the Ottoman Embassy, or sup on "treacle, green figs, and garlic" with the representative of the Nawaub of Oude. All this is very well, (i.e., if it do not make her very ill,) for these are duties of routine common to her predecessors, destined to her successors, and to be learned by questioning the very stones of the pavement of Downing Street. The grand difficulty of her vocation consists in a case of emergency, such as when the wife of the abdicated editor of the Comet or Times, or some other "leading journal," is to be presented at Court, and the Cabinet Ministresses begin to shift the disagreeable duty from one to another: or when there is a split in the Royal Family, and those favoured by the King are expected to be ungracious to the Queen; or those petted by the Queen are required to be disrespectful towards some other member of the Royal Family. Nothing so difficult to hit as the exact medium due to the exigencies of royal taskmasters or mistresses. There must not be a scruple too much of bitterness or of conscience, lest party newspapers take up the defence of the injured party. If the Sovereign turn his or her back upon any individuals, the Cabinet Minister or Ministress may just glance at them over one shoulder. If the Sovereign refuse them an audience, the Cabinet Minister or Ministress must receive them standing. But if the Sovereign expressly direct that their memorials, letters, or other molestations, be left unanswered, the Cabinet Minister or Ministress may ignore their existence altogether for the rest of their natural lives.

All this (and a great deal more, which we purpose to concentrate, at some future time, in a little volume, called the "Manual of Cabinet Ministers," to be bound in green tabby, with gilt edges, as a companion to "Bob Short on Whist," and other popular Vade-Mecums) is duly impressed upon the mind of the Cabinet Ministress, from the moment her husband takes office. She is taught her lesson as a bullfinch is taught to pipe; and nothing can be more curious than the occasional breaking forth of her natural notes, when her little official song escapes her memory; or the skill with which she falls back again into "Marlbrook," or the "Duke of York's March," when she finds herself growing too natural. Her voice has a tone in talking about Ireland, the Corn-Laws, the Royal Marriage Bill, and other delicate questions, which could only have been instilled by a bird fancier.

Cabinet Ministresses, like captains, are casual things. The virulence of certain Tory countesses, whenever they have an opportunity of giving tongue, is a proof how irritating are the effects of a fall from their high official estate, which, like other perils, leaves them, if not with broken bones, at least floundering in the mud. We all know what a foolish-looking thing was the gilt grasshopper—to which we had looked up with reverence so long as it glittered at the top of the Royal Exchange—when, brought down to the level of the earth, it lay, with other rubbish, in a tinman's yard. So is it with the Cabinet Ministresses who, during the ascendancy of their party, were painted by the presidents of the Royal Academy; engraved by Doo or Cousins; made frontispieces to annuals; sung by the Countess of Blessington, or some other equally fashionable laureate; and humbly implored to give their names and subscriptions to all the new works, all the new charities, all the new institutions; to patronize charity balls or breakfasts in favour of asylums for every disease having a bustling Esculapius to maintain its importance and be maintained by it in return; to attest the virtues of the American soothing syrup, and of the interesting object of "a case of extreme distress," at the risk of having a vote of censure passed upon their credulity by the College of Physicians, and the Mendicity Society. After enjoying all this onerous popularity—after being invited for the holidays to the best villas, and made to sink under a weight of tokens of fashionable regard—the wresting the seals of office from the hands of their lords and masters, (or slaves,) has sealed their destiny. They have become nothing, and ex nihilo nihil fit. People who used to besiege their doors with visits, send cards of condolence by their footmen; and, the following season, forget to send them at all. If they have formerly figured as beauties, the fickle voice of fashion now proclaims that they are "pretty, certainly, but silly and vacant looking;" or if, when in office, applauded as wits, they are now discovered to be "ugly beyond permission," or "peevish as a sick parrot." From the day of vacating their place in Downing Street, their feet and hands grow large, their eyes and understandings small; and, both figuratively and materially, they lose a cubit of their stature.

And of all these miseries, the Cabinet Ministress is kept in hourly apprehension by the threats of the opposition journals, and the utter dependance of her spouse upon the breath of kings and buffetings of Parliament. Like the senior captain of a marching regiment, she lives only in the hope of "getting the majority." At the political rubber she remembers only the cards that are out, and trembles for the odd trick which is to secure her game. To her, life is a speculation. There are always odds for or against her being something or nothing that day six months; and, as a Cabinet Ministress is sure to have a host of indigent nephews or cousins to provide for, she grows feverishly anxious concerning divisions and adjournments; and, after a year or two's administration, makes a pet of the whipper-in, and troubles the under secretary for his opinions and prognostications almost as often as for his franks. While protesting that she is sick to death of the cares of place, and that all she wants is to get down to her country seat, instead of being fogged into an ague in London in the month of November, (when nothing is open in town but the patent theatres and the catacombs of the national cemetery,) she is in fact trembling lest she should have to pack her traps and be off. If turned out, she knows that, like other ejected animals, she shall receive a kick from every one at parting; or, if required to bid "farewell, a long farewell to all her greatness," by the demise of her right honourable lord, she feels that she shall be required to eat thrice as much diet as other dowagers; that the country will always be flinging in her teeth the pension which is to enable her to put something between them; and should she incline to second wedlock, let her remember the abuse heaped on Mrs Perceval, and tremble. Even though knocked off her pedestal, she must evermore deport herself as if still figuring thereon.

Such are the destinies of the Cabinet Ministress. Ladies! are you tempted? The Treasury—the Foreign Office—the Colonies—are all vacant. Who bids? A royal marriage, and a second coronation, may be at hand. Think of the precedence awaiting you. Who knows but one of you, if allowed to reach the footstool of the throne, may be destined to become a Duchess Sarah? At all events, it will smooth down a thousand difficulties, and silence a million of impertinent cavillings, if, in the course of the session, our instances should be the means of supplying the missing moiety to one or other of our Cabinet Ministers.

THE ANNUALS FOR 1840.

The Drawing-Room Scrap Book.

WITH how many mingling feelings of mournful regret and rekindling interest will the new volume be opened, of a work identified with the name of L. E. L., and which so decidedly bears the characteristics of her genius and its remarkable idiosyncrasies. Year after year, we have in its pages noted her ever onward course; marked the gradual softening of the brilliant bravura singer into one whose finest tones were naturally attuned to the "still, sad music of humanity." Miss Landon, we venture to think, was only beginning to sound the unsuspected depths of her own heart, and to profit largely by the silent discipline of time and circumstance on an intellect like her's. Her spirit was soaring above the noxious atmosphere in which her powers had originally been developed. From the growing change, the gradual ripening and mellowing of thought, and the accumulations of real experience, we were indulging the fond hope, that her future literary achievements were far to surpass, in vigour and solidity, whatever she had accomplished; nor to fall short in brilliancy of her early efforts. Her tone was becoming more natural and healthy, and not less passionate; she was outgrowing the pernicious influences which had beset her path in young authorship, and was beginning to be herself. These dreams are for ever at an end.

A successor has been found to Miss Landon in Mrs Howitt, who, without her gorgeous fancy, romantic enthusiasm, and passionate vehemence, possesses poetical powers exquisite in their kind, and which, as soon as she has fairly entered upon her duties, cannot fail to be appreciated. The sweet liquid trill of the linnet is quite as delightful, to healthy natural taste, as the brilliant song of the nightingale. Mrs Howitt enters upon her office in a spirit of anxious deprecation, which damps and represses her real powers. Her strains have hitherto generally been pitched for the cottage hearth, and the snug and affectionate parlour fireside circle; and there she shone without a rival. She must now take courage, nor stumble at the threshold of the drawing-room, where she has only to enter to be quite at home,—if it be a drawing-room worthy of her presence and her abilities. In imitating, or even emulating L. E. L., she would only, in all probability, lose herself; and she has her own part to sustain, and powers quite equal to the attempt. In her care, the "Scrap-Book" must be a work widely different from what it has been, but one certainly not less worthy of the patronage of the maidhood and matronage of England.

The volume for 1840 is still enriched by the contributions of Miss Landon; by pieces either left with the publishers, or transmitted to them from Cape Coast Castle. Mrs Howitt values these fragments highly; but, with all our aptitude to admire, we must regard the new poems rather as additions to the prodigious number of L. E. L.'s verses, than as fresh proofs of her genius and of that onward progress which we have marked in her performances for several previous years. We have now to select a few specimens of the work in its old and in its new management. To a sweet and natural, and exquisitely finished print of the Gipsy Mother, Mrs Howitt has appended the following pretty little song:—

The merry miller's rosy dame
Hath not a wish her heart to tame;

The baron's lady, young and fair,
Hath gold to spend and gold to wear;
The Queen of England, richer still,
Hath all the world to do her will!

But England's Queen, with all her state,
Nor baron's wife, nor miller's mate,
With all their wealth, are blest as we,
Within the tent, beneath the tree;
As thou and I, my bright-eyed dove,
And he, the father, whom we love!

Verses on a bold and fine portrait of Cromwell, and others on a beautiful architectural view in the town of Newcastle, are those most characteristic of Mrs Howitt's sober and earnest cast of thought and considerate feelings. Among the reflections suggested to her benevolent mind by a city street are these:—

I see, within the city street,
Life's most severe estates:
The gorgeous domes of palaces;
The prison's doleful grates;
The hearths by household virtues blest;
The dens that are the serpent's nest.

I see the rich man, proudly fed
And richly clothed, pass by;
I see the shivering homeless wretch
With hunger in his eye;
For life's severest contrasts meet
For ever in the city street!

Miss Landon's longest poem is upon Westall's portrait of Byron at Newstead Abbey, and the next on the portrait of Clarkson; which prints are among the most attractive of the portraits—not so much from their artistical superiority, as the character and fame of the originals. Our brief specimen shall, however, be from what we may call the rational anti-Catholicism of L. E. L. The verses illustrate a charming view of the shrine and grotto of St Rosalia, near Palermo:—

Her's must have been a life of dreams,
Exalted and sustained
By that enthusiastic faith
Which such a victory gained.
Yet hold I not such sacrifice
Is for the Christian's creed;
I question of its happiness,
I question of its need.

God never made a world so fair,
To leave that world a void;
Nor scattered blessings o'er our path,
Unless to be enjoyed.
Look round, the vales are sweet with flowers,
The woods are sweet with song;
The soul, uplifted with their joy,
Says such joy is not wrong.

Divine its origin—divine
The faith it keeps alive;
Not with the beautiful and true
Should human nature strive.
Each fine sense, gifted with delight,
Was to the spirit given,
That, conscious of a better state,
It might believe in heaven.

Too much this weary world of ours
Hath fallen since the fall;
And low desires, and care, and crime,
Hold empire over all;
Yet not the less it is our part
To do the best we can;
A better faith, a better fate,
Man yet may work for man.

Into how many graceful forms has Miss Landon cast the leading thoughts which pervade these lines on Byron's portrait?

The youthful poet! here his mind
Was in its boyhood nurst;
All that impatient soul enshrined
Was here developed first.
What feelings and what thoughts have grown
Amid those cloisters deep and lone?
Life's best and yet its worst;
For fiery elements are they
That mould and make such dangerous clay.

Such minds are like the heated earth
Of southern soils and skies:
Care calls not to laborious birth
The lavish wealth that lies
Close to the surface; some bright flower
And inward wonders rise;
A thousand colours glitter round;
The golden harvest lights the ground.

But, not the less, there lurks below
The lava's burning wave;
The red rose and the myrtle grow
Above a hidden grave.
The life within earth's panting veins
Is fire, which silently remains
In each volcanic cave;
Fire that gives loveliness and breath,
But giveth, in one moment, death.

So framed is such a mind; it works
With dangerous thoughts and things;
Beneath, the fiery lava lurks,
But, on the surface, springs
A prodigality of bloom—
A thousand hues, that might illumine
Even an angel's wings!
Thrice beautiful the outward show—
Still the volcano is below.

It is the curse of such a mind
That it can never rest:
Ever its wings upon the wind
In some pursuit are prest;
And either the pursuit is vain,
Or, if its object it attain,
It was not worth the quest;
Yet from the chase it cannot cease,
And fold its wings and be at peace.

These, though powerful, are not the best verses of L. E. L.; but they are hallowed as the last. An engraving of a beautifully executed portrait of Miss Landon, delicately painted by MacIise, forms the appropriate and interesting frontispiece to this volume of the "Drawing-Room Scrap Book." The other embellishments are numerous and choice, and judiciously varied. Crazy Kate, from a painting by Jenkins, is a gem of art; the Rajah's Daughter, by Stephanoff, a vision of Oriental loveliness. One of the portraits is that of Lord Holland; a bland and kindly-looking, comfortable old gentleman. It was, if we remember right, not customary to say much about the portraits, unless they were those of very eminent or historical personages; but this year the "Scrap-Book" has a good word to say for everybody. Mrs Howitt should have absolutely rejected the dramatic scene, entitled The Arrival, and told us something about those two beautiful sisters herself, that would have been worth listening to. This illustration is "silly sooth."

Finden's Dramatic Tableaux; or, the Iris of Prose, Poetry, and Art.

How enchanting a combination—Prose, Poetry, and Art! Over the three united graces, Miss Mitford presides, as in former years, imparting to the TABLEAUX whatever is most charming and characteristic in her peculiar style of thought, invention, and expression. One is glad to find that the ennobling genius of old romance—rudely exorcised from the three volume fictions of the day, whose elements are either wild and extravagant passion, or the stern and coarse realities of vulgar life—obtains refuge in the Annals. Miss Barrett is once more the tuneful auxiliary of her friend, the Editor. And among her allies of the nobler sex, as they call themselves, are Barry Cornwall, H. Chorley, and R. H. Horne. The latter contributes a slight dramatic sketch The Death-Fetch, imbued with poetry. Miss Mitford, however, as well beseems her, plays the principal part in her own entertainment. The nature of her five prose tales (each brief, though graceful and felicitous) may be divined from the prints they illustrate. The King's Page is a pretty picture, illustrated by a pretty dramatic incident, the personages of which are Frederick the Great, and the page and his sister. It turns upon sisterly affection, though a little incidental true love gives zest to the narrative. The Proud Ladye—of which the scene is also Germany, though in the olden time—and The Round-head's Daughter are both love stories; the latter the gem of the volume. Miss Mitford is much more at home on the wolds and among the villages of Kent, Hampshire, and Berkshire, than in the Highlands of Scotland; and so her Woodcutter much excels The Death of Luath, though it is a neatly-turned clan fragment. A great deal of the poetry of the Tableaux is legendary—a style which is peculiarly suited to the work. Miss Barrett's supernatural legend of the Brown Rosarie, is inferior to her beautiful and pathetic poem of last year, but still a wildly imaginative performance. Our only extract must be this graceful opening of Part Third; as it is difficult, within moderate bounds, to convey any idea of how passionate love, and the fear of death tempted Leonora to the deadly sin of sorcery, and how love and faith finally redeemed her from the power of the fiends:—

"'Tis a morn for bridal. The merry bride-bell Ringeth clear through the greenwood that skirts the chapelle,
And the priest at the altar awaiteth the bride,
And the grave young sacristans jest slyly aside,
At the work shall be doing;
When down through the wood rides that fair companie—
The youths with the courtship, the maids with the glee—
Till the chapel-cross opens to sight, and at once
All the maids sigh demurely, and think for the nonce.
So endeth the wooing!

And the bride and the bridegroom are leading the way,
With his hand on her rein, and a word yet to say;
Her dropped lids suggest the replying beneath,
And the little quick smiles come and go with her breath,
If she sigheth or speaketh.

And the tender bride-mother breaks off unaware
From an Ave, to trow that her daughter is fair;
But in nearing the chapel, and glancing before,
She seeth her little son stand at the door;

Is it play that he seeketh?

Is it play when his eyes wander innocent, wild,
Yet sublimed with a sadness unfitting a child;
He trembles not, weeps not, his passion is done,
And meekly he kneels in their midst, with the sun

On his head like a glory.

"O merry fair maids! ye are many," he cried;
"But in fairness and vileness who matcheth the bride?"
O merry brave youths! ye are many, but whom
For courage and we can ye match with the groom,
As ye see them before ye?"

The pure-minded and pious child is aware of the dark dealings of his sister with the Fiend. But we cannot follow the legend, which, without its poetical dress, were comparatively tame. In the opening poem, The Dream, Miss Barrett, as many ladies have, wittingly or unwittingly, done before her, chooses to mistake a Sleeping Cupid—a very palpable boy-god—for a dreaming child. This plate, which forms the frontispiece to “The Tableaux,” is peculiarly rich and delicate, and also gorgeous in those necessary embellishments which this year give a new feature to the prints. These are a series of smaller groups, which “illustrate some point of the story”—according to Miss Mitford—and are so arranged as to form a frame-work round the central figures. Those who see “Knight’s Illustrated Shakspeare,” and other works of the same nature, will be already familiar with the plan. The execution of those dainty, Ariel-like groups is fanciful and delicate. The designs are all by J. Browne; and if somewhat theatrical in character, we may presume the artist meant it so, as the style best adapted to the “Tableaux,” such groups always consisting of stage-dressed or masquerading figures. Although it greatly impairs the effect of Mr Kenyon’s elegant verses, not to present them with Miss Mitford’s ingenious dramatic introduction, as found in the tale of the Roundhead’s Daughter, we venture this poem in its simple state.

TO AN ÆOLIAN HARP.

O breezy harp! that, with thy fond complaining,
Hast held my willing ear this whole night long,
Mourning, as one might deem, yon moon, slow waning,
Sole listener oft of thy melodious song;
Sweet harp! if hushed awhile thy tuneful sorrow,
Which may not flow uninterrupted still;
A lover’s prayer one strain less sad may borrow,
Of all thou pourest at thine own sweet will.

Now, when her forehead in that pale moon gleaming—
Yon dark-tressed maid beneath the softening hour,
As fain to lose no touch of thy sad streaming,
Leans to the night from forth her latticed bower;
And the low whispering air, and thy lone ditty,
Around her heart their mingled spells have wove;
Now cease those notes awhile that plain for pity,
And wake thy bolder song, and ask for love.

“The Iris of Prose, Poetry, and Art” has this year changed its green and gold livery, for one of richly embossed deep blue and gold, which will help to give a pleasant variety to the appearance of those modern tulip-beds—drawing-room tables.

The Oriental Annual.

Captain Bacon, who last year gallantly assumed the care and responsibility of this annual, comes forth a second time, aided by Captain Meadows Taylor, who has assisted the editor with both notes and drawings, connected with those parts of India which he has not himself visited.

India, its scenery, antiquities, legends, and romantic history, afford boundless scope to the editor; for, if European readers can once be fairly interested in a country so remote from their ordinary associations and habits, the subject-matter is inexhaustible. Fortunately for the Oriental Annualist, there is now a very large and intelligent class of British adventurers, (as well as their home connexions,) to whom the land of their long sojourn, if not of their adoption, has become a second fatherland, so that this work commands both a particular and a general class of readers. Captain Bacon has, in his table of contents, propitiated all tastes. History and picturesque description rather predominate over legends and tales; and, in the compass of this one volume, there is a good account of several important places and cities in India. Among these are Penkonda, Delhi, Boorhanpoor, Nassuk, and the Nizams’ territory, and capital of Hyderabad, with many other places. A portrait of Akbur Shah, the late Emperor of Delhi, forms the frontispiece to the volume. The painting is by a Persian, “his glorious Majesty’s portrait-painter extraordinary;” but, if the physiognomy is consequently flat and dull, the costume is faithfully preserved, of this shadow of faded royalty. Captain Bacon enjoyed the felicity of an interview with this descendant of Timour in 1834, when he was seventy-nine years of age. With flowing beard, and hair bleached to the whiteness of silver, he then looked singularly venerable. He was greatly respected by the inhabitants of Delhi, and revered by the Mahommedans throughout all India, who never failed to do him homage, when opportunity offered. He had eight wives and many children; his eldest son, Aboo Zaffir, being, as our author severely says, heir-apparent to the musnud at the period of his visit to Delhi. The Emperor was long kept a strict prisoner, by his British conquerors, within the walls of his own palace. This regal abode—“The Paradise of Earth,” as its boastful inscriptions bore—is now falling into ruin and neglect, from the poverty of the royal owners. While the Emperor dragged out life, a state prisoner of the British, he was permitted to exercise despotic power within the walls of his prison, and enjoyed the flattering if empty power of bestowing titles and dresses of honour. He was provided with a civil list, “amply sufficient to save himself and his retainers from starvation;” and, wherever he went, this remnant of an illustrious line was attended by an English guard of honour, which served a double purpose. It is rather astonishing that the kings of Europe, so quick in their sympathies with each other, have shewn so little care for their dethroned and imprisoned Asiatic brethren. This poor old Emperor, stripped of all substantial power, was only the more tenacious of preserving its signs. Lord Amherst was the first governor-general that ever visited the court of Delhi, as the Emperor could not brook any representative of the British Monarch to be seated in his royal presence; and when this indignity was first put upon him, the old man could not restrain his tears. On Lord Combermere he afterwards heaped honours and titles: the dignity of the Fish and Kettle Drum, and illustrious names, which would fill a whole column in the Peerage Register. Captain Bacon is merry on the occasion; but one cannot easily perceive why the Fish and Kettle Drum of the Great Mogul should be less worthy of reverence than the Golden Fleece or the Garter.

With the account of Delhi is interwoven that romantic story on which Mr Quin has founded the interest of his late Oriental romance, “Nourmahal.” In the description of Elichpoor and Mungrool, an account of the Thugs is introduced; and the confessions of one of those atrocious monsters is given in a free translation. Some of the anecdotes introduced in the descriptive parts are connected with the brilliant Indian campaigns of Sir Arthur Wellesley. As a specimen of the work, passing all wild legends, daring adventures, and deeds of arms, we copy out this pleasant and fresh description of the Neilgherri Mountains, in the province of Koimbatoor, in Southern India. The altitude of the highest peaks of the range is something less than nine thousand feet, which, though contemptible in comparison with the Himalaya range, is still, to Europeans, a rather respectable height; and,

Here, amid the raging heats of the tropics, scarcely twelve degrees north of the equator,

The breezy spring
Stands loosely floating on the mountain's top,
And deals her sweets around.

Hither, from the scorched and panting soil of the plains, from the smiting breath of the pestilential jungles, the traveller may be transported, almost as speedily as the reader, to regions of perpetual vernal freshness and health; and here the wandering European meets a thousand fairy friends in the "langsyne" flowers that crowd his path. The violet, the primrose, the buttercup, and wild anemone, with countless varieties of the orchis tribe, throng every bank; the wild thyme, and the tall feathery fern, clothe the mountain side; while here the dogrose, there the flowering woodbine, come peering through the clustering shrubs to seek the genial sunshine. The woods are carpeted with familiar mosses and lichens, in endless variety of tints, down to the very edge of the prattling streamlet, which, dashing through the downward glen, gathers a thousand springs in its devious chase, until it plunges, a gushing torrent of foam, over some hanging precipice. . . . How unlike INDIA! In all these scenes, in every light, in every shadow, a host of airy tongues whisper the names of places and of people which all dissolve into that one word—Home. Yet soon the vision fades, as the eye follows the course of the swelling stream. Away it glides, in a soft murmuring current, more broad, more smooth, more slow—through darkening shores, through sultry forests, and the desert wild, down to the basking plains. But a hasty glance, a hasty thought of perils past and miseries escaped, repels the measure of delight; and the imagination weaves once more the happier picture of "Sweet Home," from the large aggregate of little things which crowd upon the memory, and speak of bygone times. Whence came these pleasant scenes? is the natural question of the admiring traveller; and if a well-informed Koimbatoori be within earshot, he will be answered—"From the moon."

From the moon, according to the Hindoo legend, which we cannot quote, though we must not omit the arguments by which its truth is enforced upon the sceptical European, who is told to look at the moon when she is three or four days old, and he will see, upon her unequal disc, the very spot from which the Neilgherries were cut out. The horns are then seen to present the appearance of what is called "the old moon in the young moon's arms;" and what is wanting to complete the circumference is the quarry from whence the mountains descended. They are inhabited by three distinct races, who each claim to be the aborigines. The Burgas are the tenants of the soil, which is vested in the Thodas; and the Kotas, a wretched, degraded race, are represented as little above the brute creation. The superior race, the Thodas, Captain Bacon imagines to be of Roman origin, but upon what appears very slender evidence. They are, however, like other tribes of Indian mountaineers, a much finer people than the inhabitants of the plains. They are equal in stature to Europeans, and nearly as muscular; have hardy constitutions, regular handsome Roman features, with fine clear brown complexions, and full beards. They possess great intelligence, and their manners are frank and easy: their dispositions generous. They believe themselves aborigines of the mountains; and have no history of their remote forefathers, nor knowledge of written characters, and their language has no affinity to any other Oriental tongue. This we should think doubtful. Their upper dress (and, perhaps, it is their under dress also) resembles the Roman toga, or rather, we should say, from the description, the plaid of the Scottish Highlanders. They are a pastoral people, subsisting upon the produce of their buffaloes, which they keep in great herds, moving from place to place for the sake of fresh pasture. Their dwellings and villages are superior to those of their tenants or vassals, the Burgas.

One large hut in every village serves for the double purpose of a temple and a public dairy; though they have no religion, save a few vague superstitions, borrowed from the Hindoos. The Thoda women are comely in countenance, and have graceful figures. During the season when they are roaming in quest of fresh pastures, they visit Ootakmund, and other European settlements, offering mountain fruit for sale; and, like other mountaineers, are lively, curious, and inquisitive. [The Burgas are the husbandmen; and the rich soil of the low lands, with little or no cultivation, yields them abundant crops.

The plates in this work are more interesting for what they represent than as specimens of high art, though the engraving is by Finden; but some of the designs are of splendid character. They are generally architectural views. The binding (an important feature in your Annual) is handsome and substantial.

The Forget-me-Not.

Of the graceful mother of all the Annals, we may say, as did Milton of the general mother,

"Fairest of her daughters, Eve."

"The Forget-me-Not" opens with a gorgeous picture of Queen Victoria, in her most royal, her coronation robes—crown, sceptre, orb, &c. &c. But this attractive print is not the best of the plates, of which three or four, taken from celebrated pictures by modern artists, are truly beautiful. In literature, the Mother of the Annals musters strong in something better than mere names. Its poetry is above par; and its tales are better than the poetry. A very sweet little tale is Spike Island, by Miss M. A. Bowne; and, in a very opposite line, Dr Shelton Mackenzie has contributed an exceedingly clever sketch, entitled Le Millionaire Malgré Lui. Mary Howitt has a pleasing, natural, and truth-like domestic tragedy in Willesby Old Hall. Charles Swain has addressed the departed contributors of "The Forget-me-not," and especially L. E. L., in A Vision of the Tombs, which contains some pathetic stanzas; and James Montgomery has paid grave tuneful tribute to the young Queen.

Our slender specimen shall be in a lighter vein. Miss Lawrence is the author of the following pretty legend of The Dappled Doe; or, more correctly, the versifier. Yet if the legend be her own, the invention of this graceful incident is of merit superior to the metrical execution.

There are fifty thanes in King Egbert's hall,
Quaffing the sparkling mead;
There are fifty knights at King Egbert's call,
Each on his prancing steed,
Serving the meat, pouring the wine,
Right royally doth King Egbert dine;
And there is wassail, and revel, and din,
Our sweet Lady saith her who entereth in!

For, lo! untended by squire or page,
'Mid this rude company,
Cometh a maiden of tender age,
Of beauty most rare to see;
Wimpled in white; in her soft right hand,
Leading a doe in a silken band;
And the revel is hushed as she passeth on,
And she standeth before King Egbert's throne.

"Justice, King Egbert, for heaven's sweet grace,
All friendless I've flown to thee."
He set down the cup, and, amazed, in her face
Gazed long and eagerly.
For lovely was she as the lily's flower,
Fed by the dew, baptized by the shower;
I trow he half deemed her a saint from heaven,
So he roynlly answered—"Now ask, and 'tis given."

"Oh, erst I was lady of yonder lands,
And none durst my right gainsay;
But manors and lordships, by violent hands,
Have been wrested all away.
And he who hath done this cruel deed,
Now quaffs at thy right hand the sparkling mead,
While helpless and homeless alone I go,
Having no friend save my Dappled Doe."

The shield-bearer rose with a salvage frown—
"Young minion, thou liest!" cried he;
"Bid thy champion come forth, cast thy gauntlet down,
And the battel wage with me."
"No champion have I," maid Bertha said—
"Father, protector, and friend are dead;
But heaven, by ways human skill ne'er could guess,
Will take part with the lowly and fatherless."

"Now heaven be thine aid, since no champion
On earth hast thou but thy Dappled Doe;
Lead her straight to yon hill, and bid her go forth
Thy lordships and lands to shew.
And if she the boundary traceth aright,
I yield up my claim."—"So be it, Sir Knight," Cried the King—"Come, my thanes, to the hill let us go,
A brave champion, forsooth, is yon Dappled Doe."
On the brow of the hill maid Bertha stands,
One prayer to heaven she prayed,
Then, stooping, unloosed the silken band:
"Fair Doe, thou must be mine aid,
And may He who knoweth the right is mine,
Who in weakest things sheweth the power divine,
Trace out the path wherein thou shouldst go,
To win me my lands, my Dappled Doe."

Straight with a bound from the maiden's side,
Out springeth the graceful doe;
She skimmeth, like falcon, the meadows wide,
Like arrow from hunter's bow;
O'er the plain, through the copse, right gallantly,
Holding her course o'er the daisied lea;
Swifter than arrow she on doth go:
Our sweet Lady speed the Dappled Doe!

And on and on, over moor and plain,
Valley and hill she flies;
The hunter's horn is ringing, in vain
It soundeth; right on she hies,
Threading the greenwood, and then away
She speedeth, now lost in the distance gray;
Swifter than arrow on she doth go—
O Heaven! watch o'er thee, fleetest Doe!

One bound—the Rother rolls deep and wide—
One bound, fair creature most fleet;
'Tis crost—o'er the plain, up the green hill's side,
And now at maid Bertha's feet
She kneeleth. "Gramerry, gramercy, sweet heaven!"
The shield-bearer cried, "may my crimes be forgiven;
For well as the abbey's own books could shew,
Hath the boundary been traced by the Dappled Doe."

List! list! for the even-song bell is ringing
In the convent of Wavenley;
And sweetly the holy nuns are singing
"Laudate Domine,"
And there, with her crozier, maid Bertha stands,
Lifting to heaven her gentle hands;
While the convent seal, to this day, doth shew
The tale of the maid and her Dappled Doe.

The Juvenile Annual.

Mrs Ellis, formerly Sarah Stickney, this year edits the "Juvenile Annual." If somewhat more grave and earnest than in previous years, its value and even its interest to the young is no whit diminished. We like to see the attention of young persons fixed upon such stirring realities as the story about Luther attached to the plate of the Cathedral of Worms; and we are persuaded that even very young children are capable of appreciating such things. Day Dreams is a fiction of that sober character which is calculated to instruct while it amuses. A few pieces, in verse, are sprinkled through the volume; and the prints are gems, though perhaps not in their first setting.

Friendship's Offering for 1840.

We can only repeat what we have already said half-a-dozen times, at least, of this pretty gift-book. All the prints are not first-rate—cannot indeed be; and our maxim is, few and choice—but the literature is, we think, improving instead of falling off. The Doctor's Two Patients is a tale of a high and pure cast; The Girl of Bulgaria, a pretty romance; and there is a sprinkling of very fair Annual poetry.

Constantinople, and the Scenery of the Seven Churches of Asia Minor Illustrated.

This work may be received as a continuation of the Messrs Fisher's "Views in Syria and the Holy Land," &c. The designs, taken from nature by Allom, are of the same character as those illustrative of Palestine; but the letter-press is more systematic. It is written by the chaplain to the British Embassy at Constantinople, the Rev. Dr Robert Walsh, who appears amply qualified for the task he has assumed. The historical notices, and descriptions of all the views, are full and interesting, and recent events in the history of the Turkish empire give interest to his account of the capital and its environs. This is a period of rapid transition in Turkey, and especially in Constantinople; and both the draughtsman and the author are just in time to depict its original features unchanged for so many centuries, before they are confounded with European forms and usages, and disappear for ever. The plates are numerous, and the volume in every respect elegant.

Character and Costume in Turkey and Italy; by Thomas Allom. With Descriptive Letter-press, by Emma Reeve.

This splendid volume, if not exactly an Annual, may be classed with the more ambitious of the decorative table-books of the day. The sketches are in the new style of tinted lithography, which, with the spirit and durability of engraving, combines the softness and delicacy of pencil drawings. Twelve of the subjects are Italian, the remainder Turkish. The whole are sketched with spirit and freedom; and, besides forming an elegant work, give the untravelled a vivid idea of the manners, forms, and costumes of the countries to which they refer. The letter-press consists of brief explanatory notices of the plates, with the garnishing of a few middling verses.

CATALOGUE OF POETRY PUBLISHED DURING 1838 AND 1839.

A DRY, meagre catalogue is all that we can pretend to give of the floods of verse poured out upon the dull, reluctant ear of the public within so brief a period as the last two years. Dramatic compositions have, within the specified time, been equally abundant and neglected. With the exception of the dramas of Knowles, and one piece by Bulwer, very little has been heard of any one of them; while the majority have fallen still-born from the press.

Italy ; A Poem in Six Parts ; by John Edmund Reade,

Is entitled to take precedence in our catalogue, were it merely from its bulk and pretensions as a classic composition. Mr Reade is fluent, resonant, and reverberatory, and he has a well-tuned ear. Had Byron not unhappily forestalled him, he might have enjoyed for a season a respectable, and even a flattering reputation; but this tells two ways, for if Byron had not preceded him, there would have been no "Italy." Did our catalogue admit of specimens, we have several marked which are worthy of admiration; and one in particular—The Musings of the Poet in the Forum—which might convey to the reader a higher, and, probably, a truer notion of his powers, than our slight announcement of the title of his poem.

Vedder's Poetical Remains, and Memoir of Robert Fraser.

The benevolent purpose of this publication gives it a relative importance to which it might otherwise hardly be entitled. The profits arising from the sale are to be exclusively devoted to the benefit of the widow of Mr Fraser and her numerous family. While we place this fact prominently in view, we would not be understood to underrate the merit of the poems. They are the production of a man of refined taste, who, placed in what may be considered not the most favourable circumstances, made very respectable attainments in literature:

From the memoir, which is affectionately written by the friend of the poet, Mr David Vedder, we learn that Mr Fraser was the son of persons in very humble life near Dysart; who, however, with the noble ambition which distinguishes the Scottish poor, contrived to give their son a good elementary education. He even made some progress in Latin, which must have laid the foundation of that proficiency in Italian, Spanish, French, and German which he afterwards attained. That Mr Fraser was a critical scholar in all, or in any one of those languages, is not probable; but there are few critical linguists even among the leisurely class of scholars. And the competent knowledge of modern languages which he acquired, at least opened to him the contemporary poetry of France and Germany. Hence most of the verses in the volume are translations. It was during his leisure hours, while an apprentice and clerk to a merchant in Kirkaldy, that he acquired a knowledge of French, and some acquaintance with general literature; and he had scraped together a respectable small library at the early age of seventeen. Mr Fraser afterwards commenced business as an ironmonger in Kirkaldy, married, and to the study of languages added that of politics; unless, indeed, this last branch of Whig science comes, like reading and writing, by nature and studying The Scotsman. He became, we are told, a Whig and something more. What is more to the point, his poetical translations appeared, from time to time, within the last ten or twelve years, in The Edinburgh Literary Gazette, The Edinburgh Literary Journal, and in sundry newspapers. Mr Fraser was elected a member of the first Reformed Town Council of Kirkaldy, and, finally, gave up business—in which, from various causes, he had not succeeded—on being appointed editor of The Fife Herald. His health, long delicate, now failed fast, and he died early in the last summer, under the age of forty; and, according to his warm-hearted biographer, unfeignedly and universally lamented. He cannot yet be forgotten; and poetical, political, and purely literary friends and admirers, have now a fit opportunity of demonstrating their regard for his memory, and esteem for his poetical abilities.

Upon the whole, we should imagine that Mr Fraser's original pieces will be more admired, even by the few, than his translations. One or two very sweet Scottish songs lead us to wish that he had worked this vein more diligently. A stirring ballad on the daring attempt of Paul Jones, who steered his small piratical fleet into the Frith of Forth, and openly menaced the capital and its port, leaves a favourable impression of the abilities of the writer. It was upon a Sabbath day that the bold rover appeared in the Frith; and the poet makes felicitous use of the incident of a venerable dissenting clergyman, who left his meeting-house with his whole congregation, and, kneeling down on the sandy beach of Kirkaldy, prayed fervently that the designs of the sea robber might be disconcerted. The wind immediately rose, and shifted into the teeth of Paul Jones, who prudently sheered off. When this primitive pastor was afterwards complimented on the efficacy of his prayer, which had raised the west wind, he was wont modestly to reply—"Na, na; I prayed, but the Lord sent the wind."

Nansie Bell, the Witch of the Gallatown, one of Fraser's most original poems, though rather long drawn-out to be completely effective, is a piece of rich comic diablerie. In Schir Andro Wood of Largo, we have a spirited imitation of the old narrative ballad of Scotland. Of all his verses, we may freely adopt the opinion of his friend, critic, and biographer:—"No one can peruse them without feeling that they are at least the emanations of a pure and cultivated mind, and a gentle and kindly disposition." Mr Fraser has written some flowing Hebrew melodies; and his translations—if the delicate original spirit may have evaporated in the trying process of transference—lack no elegance of versification; but still we prefer, to all that he has written, his few simple Scottish songs. Our respect for the generous motives of the editor, and warm wishes for the success of the publication, enjoin a more elaborate notice of this posthumous work than we can at present overtake; but we must give a brief specimen of the Fife Poet, sole Laureate of "The Kingdom," so far as we are aware, for the last generation. And if Liverpool be justly proud of its Roscoe, who, from the humble stool of a counting-house clerk, became, by native talent and unaided exertion, its literary boast—Kirkaldy will surely prize the memory of Fraser.

SONG.

Ye ken na ye've been born yet.

Yestreen, at gray o' gloamin—
The sweetest hour o' a' to me—
Wat ye where I was roamin?
Wat ye wha I forgathered wi'?
O lassie, lassie! gin ye ne'er
Wi' some kind winsome laddie met,
'Neath the star o' e'en, 'mong the birks sas green,
Ye ken na ye've been born yet!

Ilk wee bird ceased its sweet sang;
The daisy shut its drowsy e'e—
But his words their warblings a' dang,
His bloom was what nae flowers might bel
O luckless lassie! gin ye ne'er
Wi' some kind winsome laddie met,
'Neath the star o' e'en, 'mong the birks sas green,
Ye ken na ye've been born yet!

Let wha will seek the gay toun,
 Wi' a' its flauntin' show and glee;
 Let wha will dance the night down,
 'Mong fops that fancy a' they see.
 But, lovin' lassie, gin ye ne'er
 Alane wi' ae leal laddie met,
 'Neath the star o' e'en, 'mong the birks sae green,
 Ye ken na ye've been born yet!

A still finer song than the above—one more tender and delicate in sentiment—is entitled, “Oh, I lo'ed my lassie weel!” Did our space, or the patience of our southern readers permit, we could wish to dwell longer upon these purely Doric rhymes. We have been tempted to select, as a specimen of the translated poetry, the Spanish verses of Don Jorge Manrique upon the death of his father. The composition is replete with elevated sentiment and moral dignity. We must, however, be contented with Fraser's translation of Goëthe's lines to Byron:—

Some kindly greeting, ever and anon,
 From the far South falls grateful on my ear,
 And calls me hence to “Harold” wandering lone—
 Nor calls in vain, though fixed my footsteps here.

And how shall I to him, with whom so long
 I've journey'd, now some cheering truth impart?
 To him who, with himself in warfare strong,
 Has striven to still a deeply wounded heart.

O that he but himself could comprehend!
 No vulgar bliss his bosom then would own;
 O that the Muse her soothing power could lend!
 And he himself should know, as to me he is known.

Attila, the King of the Huns. By the Hon. and Rev. William Herbert.

We have here an epic poem in twelve books, the subject of which is the triumph of Christianity; a poem which has cost a learned and ingenious man the labour of nearly a lifetime, and which it is but too probable has not yet found as many readers as it has pages. This neglect we cannot help considering grievous injustice, even were the poem possessed of no other merit than its learning, fidelity to history, and the almost Miltonic beauty of the versification. The Edinburgh Review probably overrated its excellences, and the precipitate portion of the press was thus provoked to make a ribald or inconsiderate onslaught en masse. We consider Attila more worthy of the perusal of the artistical student of poetry than any of our recent poetical compositions; not more from the grandeur of its proportions, and massiveness of its structure, than from the classic finishing of its minute parts.

Poems. By Henry Monkton Milnes, M.P.
 2 vols.

These “poems of many years,” and memorials of a residence on the Continent, are copies of brief occasional verses, arising from the mood or impulse of the moment, or from any outward accident, or sudden thought. They are flung forth freely and gracefully, though with little of either depth or force. In Rome and Venice, the local habitation of the remains of high art, and full of the recollection of past glories, the very atmosphere must have imparted to the poet somewhat of their own passion and dignity. The Memorials of these Remains are, therefore, his best performances.

Fra Cipolla, and other Poems. By Sir John Hanmer, Bart.

Why Fra Cipolla—Anglice, Father Onion; or, Scottice, Father Sybo—should give the title to a miscellaneous volume, of which his tricks fill so limited a space, we do not pretend to guess: but so it is. Father Onion is entitled to consideration as a lively and not inelegant satire, intended to expose the pious frauds of the begging friars of modern Italy. The Friar and the Ass is in the same vein. The shorter pieces are very gentlemanly amateur compositions; no mighty nor even continuous effort, but one felicitous thought neatly and fitly expressed.

The Pilgrim. A Poem. By the Rev. Alexander
 Henderson, Dunblane.

An allegorical religious poem, or kind of Bunyan done into rhyme. “The Pilgrim” is not yet far advanced on his journey—he has only reached Conviction Gate; and we can discern no symptom of anything to cheer him on. Mr Henderson's spirit appears so right, that we wish we could conscientiously say anything for his poetical abilities.

Touches on the Harp of Nature. By Henry Ellison.

Brief sermons or discourses in verse these Touches, upon topics interesting to humanity, and written in an affectionate and pious spirit. But as for poetry!—Yet sometimes the writer does almost fall upon the key of Burns, in which he says his Touches are played.

Association; or, the Progress of Feeling. By the Rev. George Garioch, Minister of Meldrum.
 In Four Books.

A poem in blank verse, less metaphysical, and more descriptive, than the title would imply; composed to advance the cause of religion, and not in the least likely to set the poetical world on fire.

Poetic Fragments. By Dr D. Ross Lietch.

A whole garland of fugitive pieces, among which the songs are the most to our liking. From the Vale of Yarrow and St Mary's Loch, the writer has caught a transient gleam of poetic inspiration.

Hades; or, the Transit. By W. B. Scott.

This perplexing composition is a perfect Will o' the Wisp, or Jack o' Lantern. The moment we imagine we have caught a clew to some intelligible purpose, off it slips, and we are left in mist and mire. With this we must, we suppose, be content, as the author, in the preface, informs his readers that the poem is addressed only to persons of a peculiar idiosyncrasy, and would not engage the popular attention, even in an age much more poetical than the present. This is consolation to both parties—the writer and the reader.

The Reward and Curse of Perseverance. By John King, Advocate.

What connexion this title has with the subject of this long flat-rhymed account of the discovery and conquest of America, we cannot make out; but such is one of the poems of 1839.

The Bishop's Burial. A Legend.

The author of this poem assigns a curious reason for putting his rhymes in print. It was “to obtain a clearer judgment of his powers.” We hope he is now convinced.

A Day in May. A Poem, in Six Books.
 By Thomas Clarke.

A rather pleasing descriptive poem, in blank verse; though certainly not likely to mark 1838 as a poetical era.

The Age of Chivalry, and other Poems. By Alexander Macleod.

"The Age of Chivalry" was a Glasgow University Prize poem, and obtained the annual prize offered by the Professor of Logic. Had the author suffered it to lie embalmed in that high fame, he would, as we think, in the meanwhile, have done wisely, though there is nothing of which the prize-winner—however it may fare with the prize-awards—need be ashamed of in his first crude attempt. Among the secondary pieces, "The Spell-bound Beggar" displays some power of fancy. Perhaps we should congratulate the University upon emancipating itself from classic trammels, and on becoming as free and frisky in its tastes as the young blood it nourishes. The next subject for a University prize-poem ought to be the Eglinton Tournament. A poem in this volume, entitled "The Chant of Immortality," was read in the Ethic class; but, unless they were forced upon unwilling auditors, we must say that those things would not pass in the little boys' schools—certainly not in Mechanics' Institutions—which succeed in the great boys' colleges; and that the Glasgow students have profited little by the addresses of their chancellors—Brougham, Campbell, Peel, and Stanley.

Short Essays in Verse, on Foreknowledge and Predestination. By Robert Bartley of West Hackney.

Awful themes these for poetical essays! Mr Bartley had been born, bred, and lived, as a Calvinist, until his prime of manhood, when he fell in with the Commentary of Dr Adam Clarke, and a treatise on Prescience, by the Rev. James Jones; and was converted, as we presume, to the tenets of the Arminians. We must candidly confess that we have not read his poetical essays with any care, finding but little encouragement to do so. The volumes contain a number of short pieces, all upon religious subjects.

Tubal.

This Oriental tale, in rhyme, is the production of a lady, the author of "Waldenberg," which some of our readers may have read, though we know nothing of it. We hope it may have even greater poetical merit than "Tubal."

Blindness; or the Second Sense Restored and Lost: a Poem, in Three Parts. By Andrew Park.

It would take more time and space to describe the nature of this elaborate poem, upon a highly interesting and original subject, than we can at present spare. The publication is but recent; so it can afford to wait.

The Reign of Lochrin.

This is an anonymous heroic poem in five cantos, so sublimely unintelligible that we can say nothing about it, farther than that Lochrin, the son of Brutus, a Trojan prince, was one of those fabulous British kings who flourish in the Chronicles of Geoffrey of Monmouth, and that "The Reign of Lochrin" is published by Whitaker. The notes supply an apt description of it.

"O sublime wonders!
O glorious blunders!
They must do Something new!
Very fine,
Bard divine."

Mad Moments. By A Born Idiot;

An endless string of tolerably fair sonnets, queerly printed in Italy. But the author must not be taken altogether at his word: he is not quite A Born Idiot. No one who formed the desire, and could so deftly imitate Wordsworth, can be properly so described. Besides, a born idiot is always an original, not an imitator.

The Gaberlunzie.

We cannot close our poor account with the Rhymers of 1839 without some notice, however slight, of a genuine and racy Scottish burletta, which indicates something like a revival of the genius of Allan Ramsay. Scottish folks of the olden time, and in those distant climes where the fond memories of fatherland annihilate time and space, will relish "The Gaberlunzie." Many pretty Scottish songs are interspersed with the little drama, which, we dare say, our shepherd lads and ewe-milkers will soon be lithering.

Poems. By Eliza Cook.

Here are verses, beautifully printed, and charmingly embellished, on every conceivable subject, heaped up till they fill nearly a goodly three hundred pages. Among such variety, the selection of a specimen, which we court-cously intended, should not be difficult, and yet we find it so. Summer's Farewell, and Spring's Return, and The Land of our Birth, and The Star in the West, and The Gipsy Tent, and the Wrath—we are so tired of them all long, long ago—which may be no fault of their's, though a sad misfortune to us. But our choice is fortunately not narrowed to those; for this volume contains many poems possessing that sprinkling of ideas and reflective sentiment, which we consider, if not altogether indispensable, yet greatly to be desired even in ladies' verses. We have found this quality in the verses entitled The Quiet Eye—which eye is, for aught we know, of no particular colour, shape, nor brilliancy, but merely the organ, or the sleeping place of a soul.

There's meaning in its steady glance
Of gentle blame or praising love,
That makes me tremble to advance
A word that memory might reprove.
The haughty threat, the fiery look,
My spirit proudly can defy;
But never yet could meet and brook
The upbraiding of the quiet eye.

There's firmness in its even light,
That augurs of a breast sincere.
And, O take heed how ye excite
That firmness till it yield a tear!
Some bosoms give an easy sigh;
Some drops of grief will freely start;
But that which sere the quiet eye,
Hath its deep fountain in the heart.

These verses should give our readers a fair augury of this elegant collection. Many of the verses will be more popular with readers of poetry than the above; and many which we admire, as racy and hearty old English-like effusions, are on such endeared and household themes as Old Pincher, and Gyp the Pony, and Dobbin, and The Old Farm Gate. There are some very pretty songs also, and one or two of them are Scotch, not altogether pure Doric, perhaps, and rather erring in costume; but we may be fastidious. All the songs, whether Scotch or English, would sing well, which is the main end of a song; and some are spirited and truly lyrical. This collection has one more beauty—it is embellished with Rogerial elegance—we must coin a word—and the subjects of the dainty and delicate engravings, are the more remarkable of the songs and poems. Some of them are truly lovely, and the book is altogether a handsome and desirable one.

The Covenanters, and other Poems. By H. Brown, Ayrshire.*

This little poem ought to have great success among the people of Scotland. Wallace, the Reformation, and the Covenanters, are almost the sole great epic subjects of the national annals. What to these august themes are the achievements or disasters of the Stuarts, which form so prominent a feature in our poetry, painting, and fictions? Hazlitt has somewhere said that all poets are Tories. He might have added, and all painters were Tories. But the tense is now changed, and the highest order of poetry and painting is rising from the factitious and conventional to the true and the universal. What symbolizes the exalted sentiment of a whole nation, is felt to be more poetical, as well as more grand, than the woes or the triumphs of princes, whether real or fictitious. Thus the most poetical circumstances in the annals of Switzerland and the Tyrol are the characters and adventures of Tell and of Hofer, because they are the most morally grand.

The poem which records the deeds and sufferings of that glorious martyr-band whose memory forms the pride of the Scottish peasant, is written in rhymed couplets, and in its versification gives out occasionally a faint echo of the "Pleasures of Hope." It opens well with an animated general description of the bravery in the field, and the more heroic passive endurance of those who raised the banner inscribed with "Christ and his crown—our country and our right."

Grahame and Pollok have sung the requiem of the martyrs, whose only monument is in the hearts of their countrymen; and this new poet follows their steps, giving his whole soul to the theme.

What though no trophied columns proudly rise
To grace the wild where many a martyr lies!
What though no sepulchre of pomp and pride
Points, to the stranger, where they nobly died!
'Tis love too deep, and worship too divine,
To waste itself upon a marble shrine:
Graved on the records of the living heart,
Heirs of immortal fame, they ne'er depart.
The child can lip their names with reverence deep,
And tell the moorlands where their ashes sleep;
The female heart the martyr's name recalls,
And beauty's tear o'er flower-clad ashes falls;
The virtuous tear that Scotland's daughters shed,
Reflects the glories of her noble dead.

The humble youth, when thirst of honour burns,
To the red altars of his fathers turns;
The field, the scaffold of his murdered sires,
Give a new pulse and kindle all his fires;
He feels the patriot's generous virtue glow,
And seeks a name against his country's foe.

The simple peasant, in his evening prayer,
Thanks God for those who made him Freedom's heir;
His little ones, devoutly kneeling round,
Have their first feelings roused on holy ground.
This hallowed lesson in their humble cot,
The first impressed, the last to be forgot.

Such were the heroes Scottish mothers bore,
Who proffered life their birthright to restore.
Unknown, unheard of, they had passed away
The shade and sunshine of their humble day;
Gay as the breezes o'er the mountains roam,
With Freedom smiling round their cottage home;
But when Oppression scowled along the sky,
An injured country threw her slumbers by—
The peasant burst the cerements of fate,
And stood revealed the saviour of the state.
No selfish feeling strung the peasant's arm;
His country was the talisman could charm!

Thoughts born in heaven, and glowing from the sky,
Fixed every heart, and lighted every eye!
Nobler than Rome's first Cæsar ever knew,
When round the world her conquering eagles flew;
Nobler than Cæsar from the field of war,
With captive monarchs fettered to his car.

This we consider no mean poetry, independently of the moral dignity and national interest of the theme. A fine succeeding passage contrasts the fame of aristocratic ancestry with the proud descent of the Scottish peasant, from patriot and martyred sires; and then the poet thus reverts to that noble band:—

I lov'd them from my youth; the lonely grave
Where sleep the relics of the martyred brave;
The moss-clad stone which piety had placed,
With rude inscription time had half defaced;
Where the lone curlew builds her lonely nest,
'Mid wild flowers springing o'er the sleeper's breast
Where the lark's music opens the gates of heaven,
And hush silence waves her wing at even;
The bright rays lingering round her humble bed,
As loath to part from the unhonoured dead:—
The summer breezes wafting odours round
On holier far than consecrated ground—
Night's first pale starlight twinkling o'er the scene—
All had a language whispering what had been.
I kissed the wild flowers, in their summer bloom,
That Nature nursed above the martyr's tomb;
And trembled lest some ruder step than mine,
That chance might lead into my mountain shrine,
Should crush them blooming on the lonely heath,
And ruthless tread o'er him that sleeps beneath.
I wept above his wrongs—the burning tear
Fell with a pang, as o'er a parent's bier;
Earth's best and bravest! Scotland's boast and pride!
Chased like the wild bird on the mountain side.

An animated and solemn passage celebrates the swearing of the National Covenant by the People and their Delegates upon a Sabbath day, in the High Church of Edinburgh; and another, the martyrdom of M'Kail, of whose enthusiastic character Scott has made such felicitous use in his Macbrair in "Old Mortality." Macbrair is, indeed, a literal transcript from the annals of the persecution, as they are given in the "Cloud of Witnesses," and the other records of that dark and yet unspeakably glorious period of Scottish history.

The celebration of worship in the moorland wilds, and of the Sacrament, affords scope to the poet.—Thus Cargill presides:—

The great Cargill, with years and sufferings crowned,
Stood with his white locks streaming in the blast,
Like some prophetic being of the past;
With inspiration's voice denouncing wo
Against the arm that laid his country low.
Spread on the flower-clad table of the moss,
Behold the sacred symbols of the cross!
All shed a heaven-like sanctity around,
And stamped it holier yet than classic ground.
And with the Promise calmed the troubled breast,
Pointing the spirit to the land of rest.

With this solemnity and its many poetical and picturesque accessories, are contrasted the licentious revels of the cavaliers, and those apostate clergy who shared in them. The character of Sharp, in whose death the poet cannot see the black enormous crime alleged, the Battle of Drumclog and Loudon Hill, (which appears this poet's Parnassus;) the heroes of the Covenant, and Claverhouse and his ruthless associates and sanguinary minions, come in for their appropriate share of warm praise or stern denunciation. The well-known cold-blooded murder of John Brown, by the troopers of Graham, in the presence of his heroic wife, forms a beautiful episode; one of those extracts which we like to meet with in the reading-books of our parish schools; although in this one case verse fails, and the homeliest prose of the narrative becomes the most pathetic poetry. This is a fine subject for painting.

* Glasgow: Symington & Co.

The fourth and concluding canto of the Covenanters contains, we venture to say, some very noble poetry, A rapid view is taken of the revelation and progress of Christianity; the sufferings of the primitive Christians and Martyrs; the corruption and darkness of the Middle Ages; the dawn of the Reformation, and the attempts of the papal power to suppress knowledge and to prostrate and enchain the minds and souls of men. An apostrophe to Huss and Wickliffe, is followed by this more extractable, if less high-toned apostrophe to printing.

The living voice has but a narrow sphere—
Its tones must die upon the listening ear;
The burning periods eloquence might roll
Forth from the glowing lips to fire the soul;
The truths sublime which elevate the heart,
Might come, like hope, to mock us and depart.
Hail, Printing! hail! the saving light of earth!
Hail to the heaven-born mind that gave thee birth!
The pillared thrones, deep-based and built on crime,
May feel the blasts of battle and of time,
The tyrant tremble for his power when Thou
Circlest with lightning thy indignant brow.

Source of a thousand blessings! on thy page
There live the blush of youth and strength of age.
Immortal registrar! around thee cast
Are all the mighty empires of the past;
Whatever science has from nature wrung—
Whatever lofty strains the muse has sung—
Nature's great truths, the living page of heaven,
To thy immortal record has been given.
The poor man feels thy sweet and softening smile,
Pores o'er thy treasures and forgets his toil;
Triumphs with thee above his scanty store—
Give him his book alone he asks no more;
He knows that life is not alone to live,
And feels a transport gold can never give.
The moral lever that must lift our race
To thy proud sphere, and keep them in their place;
The hundred lands that yet in darkness sleep,
Where crimes are done that make the world to weep, Thou yet shalt startle from their slumbers, when
They will gird on the attributes of men;
Strike out the latent energies of soul
From Afric's deserts to the icy Pole;
And, angel-like, pursue thy glad career,
Till hymns of knowledge ring around our sphere.

The miscellaneous pieces—all of a grave character—which fill above half the volume, increase our esteem for the writer's powers. Though entirely unknown to us, he deserves to be known to his countrymen, and we hope that his work is already not unnoticed.

With our small tribute of admiration we therefore offer an apology for this tardy and imperfect notice of "The Covenanters," and our best wishes for its success.

From a copy of verses on John Knox preaching in the old baronial town of Galston, we shall copy out a few stanzas.

Rude fragment of a former age—
A breath on history's fleeting page—
Thy day of glories gone;
Where the bard's strains were proud and high,
Where valour knelt 'neath beauty's eye,
Now tenantless and lone.

Along thy battlements the tread
Of mail-clad men to battle wed—
The soldier and the slave;
When life was chivalrous and brief—
The worthless vassal of a chief,
Who held it for the grave.

But with the tide of change there came Another sound, another name,
That made even monarchs bow;
No soldier's steel begirt his breast,
No waving plume or helmet crest
Was on his fearless brow.

The burning eloquence that rolled,
Like thunder on the mountain wold,
In mercy's hallowed home,
Awoke strange echoes as it rung,
Where nought but deeds of blood were sung,
Beneath thy time-worn dome.

The stormy period of the past,
The trumpet's voice, the clarion's blast,
Thy proud baronial power;
Thy thousand flashing, sheathless swords,
Are nothing when a Knox's words
Have hallowed thee, lone tower!

And now we are proud to enrol H. Brown, wherever he may sojourn, or whatever may be his profession, among the poets of the New Era.

LITERARY REGISTER.

Martin Doyle's Cyclopaedia of Practical Husbandry, and of Rural Affairs in general.

THIS must be a good farmer's book, were it only that it contains the highly concentrated essence of hundreds of good books on agriculture, the breeding and rearing of cattle, the management of stock, and all the lesser matters of rural domestic economy. Bees figure at large, but bees are not neglected; and Martin Doyle, from his past experience, is entirely at home about pigs, poultry, the dairy, the garden, and the various comforts of the cottage and the farm-house. The Cyclopaedia is, in short, an ample and really valuable compendium of the knowledge directly useful to a very large proportion of the public, and interesting to everybody. It is written with the author's customary lively good humour and genial feeling. We should conceive the work an admirable companion to the British emigrant, turning farmer, and also to his helpmate; for much, though not the whole, is peculiarly applicable to their new circumstances.

Let us hope that Irish gentlemen will listen when Martin lectures them about the necessity of granting leases, for their own sakes, as well as the well-being and independence of their tenantry—if "independent tenantry" be a phrase to be tolerated in Ireland, any more than the state which it signifies. He quotes Curwen on this head:—"What has advanced Roxburghshire, Northumberland, and Durham above the rest of Great Britain for agriculture and value of land? No doubt the spirit of the farmer, under the security of long leases." There can, indeed, be little spirit shewn by an Irish farmer of ordinary prudence, who, without a lease in his pocket, sets about improving his farm in the face of what Martin Doyle facetiously terms "an Irish premium"—i. e., an immediate advance of the rent in proportion, at least, to the amelioration the tenant has effected on the soil. We wish we could give full credence to the reports cited of the condition of Scottish farm-servants. By one hypothesis, (and it is no more,) the average income of a married hind and his family is made up to £51:9:4 in money value, exclusive of his cottage and garden—as if hinds had gardens. The utmost that Martin Doyle can make out for the Irish married labourer and his family is £17:10s.; and it also is, we fear, too high an average, for it assumes 10d. a-day as the labourer's wages. The income of the English married labourer would appear to range from £27:13s. to £36:0:3. Nor do we imagine that the Scottish farm-labourer's emoluments can exceed this last sum, save in the case of shepherds, or persons having a charge. The dietary of the English and Scottish farm-servant, as described by Martin Doyle, might make the Irishman's mouth water, if habit had not made the potato sweeter to him than bread of wheaten flour thrice bolted. The humane-spirited Martin Doyle tells nothing of the wretched condition of the Irish peasantry which is new to the readers of this Magazine; but he deserves great praise for not entirely blinking the question, as is the usual custom with many of the vapouring talkers about the "finest pisantry in the world."

The Colony of Western Australasia: a Manual for Emigrants to that Settlement and its Dependencies. By Nathaniel Ogle.

For the settlement familiarly known as the Swan River Colony, Mr Ogle does here what so many different writers have of late attempted to do for South Australia and New Zealand; and his work is more systematic and complete than those relating to these colonies. We must not say, as we have done of some other books of this sort, that it is a puff of the settlement on the Swan River; but we may fairly describe it as an attempt to place that hitherto unfortunate colony in the best light. Mr Ogle is loud in complaint of the colonial system of the British Government, if system it may be called; nor is he satisfied with the principle which, for want of a better name, goes by that of Mr Wakefield. Among the objections to the Wakefield or self-supporting principle, are the following, urged by Sir James Stirling, late Governor of Western Australia:—

It takes the management of land questions entirely out of the control of the colonists; it appropriates the proceeds of sales to other than colonial purposes; it favours the speculator in land, and imposes a heavy restriction on the actual cultivator; it destroys equality of condition, and discourages industry; and it forces capital and labour into pastoral pursuits, by imposing burdens on agricultural occupations, which they cannot bear; and, lastly, it contains no provision, as in the case of America, for the protection of the actual cultivator, by the power of burdening unoccupied land for local purposes.

Mr Ogle, however, admits that the Wakefield principle has not been strictly acted upon, and consequently is not fairly tested. His own project seems an improvement on Mr Wakefield's. This is his practical deduction:—

Under existing circumstances, there can be no doubt of its being far more advantageous for an emigrant to purchase for £25, from the Government, (probably for much less, of some proprietor,) one hundred acres of land in Western Australia, than to pay £100 for it in South Australia, with the right of an expenditure of £75 in the transit of labourers. In the latter colony the pasture is not limited, and the Government expend the £25 received for the land in the transit of emigrants; leaving him £75 to expend in labour and improvement, as best suits the nature of the land, and intended occupations;

thus causing a positive expenditure in the district, which is more productive of benefit than if spent in the passage and outfit of workmen in England, and is certain to draw labourers from the mother country, in addition to the supply arising from the Government resources. This fact, clearly understood, would draw the intended emigrant to Western Australia instead of to South, where these regulations are in force.

This is sound reasoning. Other circumstances being equal—such as, the quality of the land and the moral state of the colony—we know not who would not rather purchase his 100 acres for £25, and have £75 to expend on their improvement at his own discretion, instead of that being done for him by a body of commissioners, over whom he has no control, or taken to pay the interest of debts they may have contracted; and if from "Augusta to Henly's plains an emigrant may find hundreds of thousands of acres fit for every use," we cannot imagine why he does not purchase these, and thus save £75 out of every £100 to improve his purchase, or do with it what best suits him. To the small capitalist desiring independence, or to him whose principal capital is in the bones, and sinews, and persevering industry of his sons and daughters, and in his own intelligence, all the colonies appear to us to possess advantages over South Australia. In the meanwhile, the capital attracted by one means and another to that settlement, may make it, for a time, of superior advantage to the mere labourer, and the common artisan.

In matters of economy and detail, this book affords some useful information to Australian emigrants, which, familiar as we fancy ourselves with the subject, we have not met with elsewhere. One hint is of the newly discovered defence against the ravages of those minute pests, the white ants. It is Margary's Patent, or the sulphate of copper, rendered applicable to wood, cloth, cordage, &c., &c., which, by its use, are rendered invulnerable to mildew, damp, heat; and, above all, to the attacks of the termities.

With encouragements, Mr Ogle gives cautions to emigrants; warning them, that though the country is beautiful, and the future prospects cheering, they should remember that it is "a difficult, hard-working, matter-of-fact life," until the emigrant has established himself, built his house, and put his land under proper cultivation, and his cattle and flocks under the care of faithful and experienced men: no easy matters these. After this warning, the author makes the utmost possible of the superior advantages of the colony of Western Australia over all the other colonies. His advice to emigrants on minute affairs is, as we have said, valuable, and includes many minute particulars which ought to be known. The work, at its conclusion, leaves us at a loss what to think of the prospects of this colony, which is at present very much at the mercy of the Colonial Secretary. That it, and all these colonies, must ultimately succeed, there is no possible doubt; but, which is best in the meanwhile?

A Treatise on the Medical Jurisprudence of Insanity. By I. Ray, M.D.

This is a reprint of an American work of considerable merit. At least we imagine it is a reprint, as it is evidently an American production, and nothing is said of this being the original publication. A preliminary essay, written with clearness and ability, is from the pen of Dr Spillan. Though the work is substantially a compilation from the "Trials of Lunatics," and the writings of French, English, and German physicians—in which, indeed, its principal merit consists—it is executed by an ingenious man, who has a good understanding of the subject, and generally sound views, though they may occasionally be pushed too far in one direction, from the author's evident bias to the doctrines of Gall and Spurzheim. In them he appears, indeed, a confirmed believer. Bearing this tendency in mind, much useful information may be gleaned by the student of legal medicine from the volume; were it only, as we said, from the facts brought together, whether as illustrations of the sound or of the fallacious reasoning. Incorrect printing is becoming so notorious in the London press that it should be rebuked. This book is an example, among others, of a flagrant kind.

Chemistry no Mystery ; or, a Lecturer's Bequest.

By John Scoffern, Surgeon, and Lecturer on Medicine.

This is a charming little work, leading on the juvenile student gradually and pleasantly, smoothing for him the path of science, and, we may almost say, bordering it with flowers. The engravings illustrating the numerous popular experiments are neatly executed; but the great merit of the work belongs to the lecturer, who has a happy knack in selecting his materials and setting them in attractive order. This little book will form a desirable acquisition for the parlour school or the public school, and for young ladies as well as boys.

Researches on the Physical and Social State of London, Ancient and Modern. By A. M. Buread Riofrey.

This work is written in French, and printed in Paris. The author has diligently studied the peculiarities of the medical art as it is practised in England; and, having thus acquired a second medical education, he reasons like a liberal philosopher upon the striking differences in London and Parisian practice. Though at first astonished, he now finds a rational cause for modes of curative treatment apparently so opposed as those of the French and English physicians. So many French and Continental persons are now to be found in London, and so very many English in Paris, and other towns of France, that he conceives his work may be found useful to physicians in both countries. The second part is to contain the Social and Medical History of London, during the eighteenth century; the third that of the Last Forty Years of a Metropolis, "la plus peuplée, la plus puissante, la plus riche du monde." The book is curious, in a literary as well as in a scientific view.

Essay on the Versification of Homer ; and his Digamma. By James M'Ivor, of Trinity College, Dublin.

This work will mainly interest those who either believe in, or boldly question the classic or rather Grecian infallibility of Professor Dunbar of the Edinburgh University. This Mr M'Ivor ventures to do roundly and boldly. Content with merely directing attention to his audacious attempt, we leave the learned controversy to the judgment of the learned.

The Fatalist ; or, the Fortunes of Godolphin.

By an Essayist on the Passions. 3 vols.

On this mixture or combination of the romance and the novel of character, a man of talent has bestowed considerable pains, and produced a clever and entertaining book. The ground is, as we imagine, fresh in fiction. It is Cornwall, sixty years since, with its fine bold scenery, and primitive squires, peasants, and miners. A good deal of original character, and unchanged manners are still to be found, we imagine, in that province, among its Trelawneys, Trevanions, and the many other Pens and Tres. The author appears to have a good knowledge of the habits of the miners, though his dialect sometimes looks more mongrel than purely Cornish. The rope of his story consists of three strands, and he sometimes becomes rather embarrassed in getting them up in equal time; nor are they always skilfully interwoven, after they are brought up. But he has produced a readable and amusing novel, with interest sufficient to keep the reader always alive and moving; and this is no mean praise. Some of the characters and occurrences, perhaps, outrage probability; but what of that? They tell well, and that is enough to the novel reader.

Abraham Bagman, or the Adventures of a Bailiff.

By Waterton Jones.

Another this, of the prolific Boz family, with the familiar family features, and occasionally "the trick of the eye." In the first Number the author, who seems to know the Town well, and who has hit upon a capital theme, merely marshalls the personages of his bustling drama, and gives the stage directions, and the Induction, in which Abraham makes his debut as a first-rate bum-bailiff—a master of his craft—and works up a few lively and quickly-shifting scenes. If the series prosper, which it deserves to do, we shall have more to say in the way of criticism. Lowness of price may prove a detriment. Waterton Jones gives about the ordinary shilling quantum—pictures and all—for a groat.

The Reverend William Innes' Excitement.

This little Annual for the juveniles—the "NEW EXCITEMENT"—is for the year 1840, even more entertaining and varied than formerly. The stories are generally shorter, and consequently more numerous. Travels, adventures, natural history, personal enterprise, perilous deeds, and traits of hardihood, and "moving accidents by flood and field," are mingled in excellent proportions, so as to compose a volume of instructive and highly amusing reading for young persons, and consequently a desirable and proper gift for them.

POLITICAL REGISTER.

THE effect of the great success of the Attorney-General—and of which he boasted at the breakfast lately given him in Edinburgh—in obtaining, without a single exception, verdicts of guilty against Chartist operatives by middle-class juries, has been to increase the dislike of the operatives to their existing political condition, and to drive the Welsh into open insurrection. On the morning of the 4th of November, Newport, in South Wales, was attacked by many thousands of armed men from the mines and iron works in the adjoining country. The magistrates had no notice of the deep-laid and extensive conspiracy, which had, for some weeks at least, been in operation; and only heard of it a few hours before the outbreak. The only troops in the town consisted of half a company of the 45th foot. It was the avowed object of the insurgents to attack, in the first place, the military; and fortunate it was that the soldiers were placed under cover, in a position which, while it commanded the street, rendered the fire-arms of the Chartists, which were loaded only with slugs, useless; otherwise we might now have to record events of much greater importance than have actually occurred. John Frost, the well-known ex-magistrate and delegate, appears to have acted as commander-in-chief, and probably organized the movement; but the actual leader in the attack on the inn, where the mayor with the other magistrates and the soldiers were placed, seems to have been Lovell, a gardener, and a man in comparatively easy circumstances. Notwithstanding the cowardice of the Chartists in being defeated by a handful of soldiers has been so much commented on, we must express our opinion that they behaved with great bravery. Without any means of retaliating efficiently—for very few indeed of them were possessed of muskets and bullets—they exposed themselves, without the slightest protection, to a brisk fire of the soldiery, for fifteen minutes, and did not retreat until twenty or twenty-five of them were killed on the spot, and, as is said, from fifty to sixty, but more probably from one hundred to one hundred and fifty of them were wounded. In the recent “most glorious achievement” of the British army in India, only seventeen were killed, and one hundred and ninety-one were wounded. A special commission has been issued to try the prisoners; eleven of whom, including Frost, have been committed under a charge of high treason. The Tories are, of course, howling for their blood; but, considering how much has been already spilt, Botany Bay may, we hope, be substituted for the block, even in the cases of Frost and Lovell. Meanwhile, South Wales has been filled with horse and foot and dragoons; and ammunition waggons and cannon have been sent from Woolwich, to keep the Chartists from rising in open rebellion. All this may do for a short time, but, unless the grievances under which the body of the People labour be investigated and removed, tranquillity will be of short duration. One of the most alarming symptoms of the late insurrection, is the successful tampering with the soldiery; two of whom actually deserted, though one of them returned to his duty before the attack on Newport was made. If one in fifteen of the army be prepared to join the Chartists, it is time Ministers were bestirring themselves. And so they are, we believe, in as far as physical force is concerned. We are informed, on good authority, that the army is to be greatly increased—the home regiments are each raised to 1000 strong—and that the greatest activity prevails in the manufacturing of military accoutrements. Where the money is to come from to pay for all this, is more than we know.

LOCAL LEGISLATURES.—We are glad that this subject—to which we were the first to direct attention—is attracting notice; for we are convinced it only requires to be carefully considered to secure public approbation. A local legislature, sitting in Dublin for the despatch of business exclusively Irish, would be of the utmost advantage to Ireland; while it would not be at all liable to the most serious objection to a Repeal of the Union, the danger of a complete separation of Ireland from the British Crown. We have much satisfaction in observing that Mr Sharman Crawford has, in a great measure, adopted our views; and we hope he will use his eminent talents, and great influence, to enforce them on the notice of the Irish nation. Under any circumstances, the legislature of Great Britain is utterly unfit for the despatch of the continually increasing business before it. The local and private bills now occupy more of the time and attention of Parliament than the whole business altogether did, half a century ago. Another imperative reason for the establishment of local legislatures, not only in Ireland and Scotland, but in various places in England, is the state of parties. The warfare between the two sections of the aristocracy has, for some years, been carried on in an unprecedented manner. The chief tactics of the Opposition are to destroy the measures introduced by the Ministry; and then, at the end of the session, to hold up the party in power to ridicule and contempt, on account of the small quantity of business got through during the session. The Ministerial party assuredly shew no great alacrity in bringing forward business, and postpone everything that can possibly be postponed; but the other boasts of its prowess in “smashing” the Ministerial bills when they come within its reach. Meanwhile, the country suffers the greatest inconvenience. How many useful bills regarding Scotland, for example, have been introduced, of late years, and either thrown out on account of mere party motives, or postponed, because it was seen to be impossible to get them through Parliament? The “smashing” power, as Sir John Campbell calls it, of the Tories, and the lockfast of the present legislature, may be judged of from the following facts:—In 1814 Parliament passed 190 public acts; in 1815, 196; in 1837, the number was only 91; and, in 1838, 120. We believe that the number of such acts passed last session, did not exceed 97. Had we not been long accustomed to it, nothing would appear more absurd than to apply to a legislature sitting in London for a bill to make a road or railway at our own door, and to carry all the witnesses, engineers, and men of business, at a great expenditure of money as well as of time, four or five hundred miles off. As to getting rid of local prejudices by making the application to a distant legislature, we do not see any such effect. Local prejudices—witness, for example, the improvements on Leith Harbour, and the appointment of Sheriff-Substitute in Leith—appear to travel as easily to London as they would do to Edinburgh.

We have, in former numbers, gone so fully into the details of this measure, that we feel it unnecessary at present to resume them; and we only notice the subject at present in order to direct public attention to it, now that it has been advocated by one whose opinions are so highly and justly esteemed.

SCOTLAND.

SHERIFFS-SUBSTITUTE.—We are glad to observe that Mr Wallace of Kelly has taken up the subject of the inadequate remuneration of these Judges, who are by far the most useful, as well as hard wrought, we possess. We have frequently attempted to direct public attention to this matter, and have, for years, advocated an increase of the salaries of Sheriffs-Substitute; but neither any portion of the press, so far as we have observed, nor even the Substitutes themselves, seemed inclined to give us any assistance. Whether this apparent indifference to their own interest arose from the dependent condition of the Substitutes, who were liable to be dismissed at the pleasure of the Deputies under whom they act, we know not; but, if that were the reason, it is in part obviated by an act passed last year, which renders the consent of the Lord President and Lord Justice Clerk, expressed in writing, necessary for their removal. At all events, we are glad to find that they are stirring in their own defence; for, while we are decidedly of opinion that the over payment of public functionaries is ruinous to their efficiency, we believe that their inadequate payment is very injurious to the public. Why these Judges should not, like all others, hold their appointments, ad vitam aut culpam, it is difficult to discover; for if an appointment in such terms has been found essential for the maintenance of the independence of Judges receiving salaries of £3000 or £4000 a-year, it seems still more necessary in the case of those who are only allowed from £150 to £400. Of the fifty-three Sheriffs-Substitute in Scotland, two—those for Edinburgh and Glasgow—have salaries of £400, which is the highest allowed; twelve have £200; and four only £150 a-year. One of the latter—the Sheriff of Skye—has between 20,000 and 25,000 people under his jurisdiction, and a territory of nearly fifty miles in length, by thirty in breadth, intersected by lochs, arms of the sea, and mountains, and exceeding, in extent and population, some German principalities, which have given Kings and Queens to Great Britain. Sheriffs-Substitute must not be absent from their district more than two weeks at a time, nor six weeks altogether in any one year. They are prohibited from acting as agents in legal, banking, or other business, or as conveyancers, factors, or chamberlains, or from holding any other office than Sheriff-Substitute. They must, in short, abstain from every means of eking out their paltry allowance—must live in the style of gentlemen; to command respect—associate, occasionally at least, with the nobility and gentry of the district—during summer are liable to be torned on to a grievous extent by inconsiderate tourists—must be well educated, and acquainted with all branches of the law, at their peril; discharge numerous duties, not only as judges, criminal and civil, but preserve the peace of their districts, and perform a great variety of ministerial offices—and all for £150 a-year—a sum little more than the emoluments of a Macer of the Court of Session, for 14 days service, per annum, and for two or three hours a-day—a service which does not prevent him from carrying on any business he pleases, and whose only essential qualification is being able to read. If we compare the qualifications, duties, and salaries of Sheriff-Substitutes, with those of the Clerks of our Supreme or even inferior Courts, we will see how inadequately they are paid. The principal Clerks of Session—some of whom have the greatest difficulty in drawing up the simplest judgment of the Court—have £1000 a-year; and they have been in the practice of drawing, without any legal warrant, a retired allowance of £666 a-year, when ill health forced, or their convenience suited them, to retire. Their year's work does not occupy in all 228 hours. They require little, if any, knowledge of the law, though it has no doubt happened that the ease and respectability of the situation, and the high salary, have attracted one or two eminent lawyers, who were not calculated for, or had not the influence necessary to raise them, to the Bench. The Depute Clerks of Session, who, like their principals, hold all but a sinecure situation, though they may have a few hours longer attendance in Court per annum, have £400 a-year; their Substitutes have £350, with a fee they have contrived to raise for themselves—without any warrant—of 4d. on each interlocutor, amounting to £80, or £80 more. The private Clerks of the Judges have from £500 to £300 a-year, and some of them also draw compensations for loss of fees. All these numerous clerks have little or no responsibility, and, with the exception of the principal clerks, none of them have gone through a course of legal study, or education, or apprenticeship, or pretend to any knowledge of the law. Their duties are capable of being effectually performed by a person of the most ordinary capacity, and are indeed mere routine, which any one, however innocent of legal attainments or aptitude, may, by ordinary industry, acquire in the course of a few months' practice. In the inferior courts, again, such as the Sheriff and Burgh Courts, the Clerks are very generally much better paid than the Sheriff-Substitutes of their respective districts, the Clerk, in many instances, drawing three or four times the income of his master the Judge. It is plain that such a state of matters cannot be allowed longer to continue. It only requires to be taken up by the public generally, as it has been in Renfrewshire, to put an end to it. There is only one objection that can be urged against the increasing of the salaries of Sheriff-Substitutes, and that is, that the Treasury have no money for the purpose. We will dispose of this objection very shortly, after giving a few more statistical details. In the years, 1834, 1835, and 1836, 53,551 causes of all sorts—civil, criminal, consistorial, actions ordinary and summary, and small debt cases—were disposed of by the Sheriff-Substitute, of which only 2,344 were appealed to and decided by the Sheriff-Depute. This is less than five per cent. The interlocutors pronounced by Sheriff-Substitutes during the same period, exclusive, it is believed, of small debt causes and criminal trials, were 37,443, by Sheriff-Depute 3,816, or little more than ten per cent. The judgments of the Sheriff-Substitute were affirmed in the proportion of fifteen to one reversed; so that, assuming the Deputes were right in all their reversals—and the Court of Session certainly does not always agree with the Deputes in their judgments—there were fifteen frivolous and vexatious appeals for one which ought to have been made. It is difficult to shew the nuisance of the office of Sheriff-Depute in a stronger view. It thus appears that nine-tenths of the duties of the office of Sheriff are performed by the Substitutes, and one tenth, and this is a liberal allowance, by the Deputes. Let us see how the emoluments are divided.—The total emoluments of the Sheriffs Depute and Substitute of Scotland, arising from all sources, on the average of the years 1834, 1835, and 1836, were £21,890, of which the thirty Deputes, senechal and non-resident, drew the lion's share, £15,720—and the 53 working and resident Substitutes, £15,562. But it must also be kept in view that the Substitutes, as already mentioned, are prohibited from doing anything to increase their income; while the Deputes are enjoined by a statute, not yet fifteen months old, "to be in habitual attendance in the Court of Session, during the sittings thereof," (that is to say, carrying on their business as lawyers in Edinburgh, and drawing, if they can, by their private business, to the utter neglect of their official duties, thousands a-year,) "and if any such Sheriff shall not hold courts within his sheriffdom, or shall not attend the Court of Session as before provided, it shall be competent for her Majesty's Advocate to present a summary petition or complaint to the Court of Session, complaining of such Sheriff not holding courts, or of such non-attendance; and the same being thereupon duly investigated and established, upon a summary trial before the said Court, such Sheriff shall be admonished for the first offence, and for the second shall be deprived of his office." The Sheriff-Depute of Edinburghshire and Lanarkshire, are alone excluded from habitual attendance on the Court of Session. Although, however, it is notorious that a great many of the Sheriff-Depute do not attend the Court of Session at all, we have heard of no trials or admonitions. Why? we may ask the Lord Advocate. Perhaps, in next number we may furnish him with a list for "admonition," if he does not bethink himself.

Our proposal, then, for obtaining an efficient body of Sheriff-Substitute in every part of the kingdom, without increasing the burdens on the People, is simply as follows—and we would not have ventured to have made it, had we not had in our perfect recollection, that, when the Whigs got office in 1831, they professed, through Lord Althorpe, that "the principle of their Government was to rule without patronage;" that the vacancies which occur in the office of Sheriff-Depute shall not be filled up; and then that all the absentees from the Court of Session, in session time, be first admonished, and, if refractory, dismissed. If this be done, we will venture to prophesy, that, in two or three years, there will be an ample fund for raising the salaries of all the Sheriff-Substitute, who are now inadequately paid, to a proper amount. To improve still further the system, no appeal should be allowed to be made from the Substitute to the Depute, but from the Substitute to the Court of Session, whereby an intermediate step—whole, as is evident from what we have already stated, is, in nine cases out of ten, resorted to merely to increase delay and expense—would be rendered unnecessary. It is evident that, if higher salaries were given to Sheriff-Substitute, a higher class of lawyers than have hitherto occupied that office would consider it an object of ambition; that the business both of the Supreme, Civil, and Criminal Courts would thus be diminished; that the time and money of litigants would be saved; while litigation and crime, which are fostered by nothing more than the "law's delay," would sustain a serious check.

MORE FREQUENT CIRCUITS.—This is another excellent suggestion for the improvement of the law which Mr Wallace has brought forward within the month. Circuits, except in Glasgow, being at present held only twice a-year, a person accused, however innocent, may remain many months in jail, if the crime of which he is accused be not bailable, or if he have not the fortune to possess friends who will become surety for him. During all this time the law regards him innocent, whatever may be the result of his trial; but he must associate with felons—for our prisons do not afford the means of separating the accused from the convicted—and he must content himself with the jail allowance of convicts; because his hands are tied, and he is kept in idleness, until it suit the convenience of the magnates of the law "the Lords Commissioners of Justiciary," to inquire into his case. Here let not our readers suppose we are ignorant of what has been called the Scotch Habeas Corpus Act—viz., 1701, c. 6. But we are aware that, if the provisions of that act are properly worked, an innocent man accused, will have to endure some months' imprisonment before he can extricate himself from jail. Now, keeping an innocent man in jail—and every one is to be held innocent who has not been tried—is nothing else than an outrage, justifiable only by the necessity of the case; and every day which he is detained before trial, not absolutely necessary for the attainment of justice, is totally unwarrantable, and an injury, not only to the individual detained, but to society at large; for they not only lose the labour of, perhaps, an efficient citizen, but are burdened with his maintenance in idleness. Nobody, it is presumed, will, at this day, contend that prisoners not tried should, in addition to their imprisonment, be compelled to labour for their own sustenance. Farther, suppose an innocent man be kept in jail, among convicted felons, for months, it is almost impossible, particularly if he be a young man, not to come out thoroughly tainted. Thus, by the existing system, where you do not find a criminal you make one; and if you do not succeed in getting an innocent man condemned for a crime he never committed at the first trial, you may very probably have the satisfaction, on his second trial, to obtain a conviction for a crime he has committed. Besides, as was very clearly shewn by the Marquis Beccaria half a century ago, and admitted ever since, by every lawyer who has risen above the handicraft of his profession, the effect of punishment depends, for its efficacy in repressing crime, more on its promptitude (promptezza) than on its severity, or any other circumstances attending it. One would have thought the admirable treatise "Dei delitti e delle pene" of Beccaria, so short, so logically reasoned, so luminous, so readable and even amusing, and spread as it was over the whole civilized world, a few years after its publication, with an able commentary by Voltaire, might have operated on the existing generation—the third from its date—and modified the absurd and atrocious doctrines, and heartless administration of criminal law. But all experience teaches that, while fraud and fanaticism disperse themselves, with the celerity of the winds, through mankind, the progress of truth and common sense can only be marked at intervals of many ages. But to return: it is the obvious interest, both of the accused and of society, that speedy trial and speedy punishment should follow apprehension. And we, in Scotland, have admirable means, without innovation, without increasing patronage, without creating expense, to accomplish this object. It is generally admitted that the keeping up the two Inner Houses, as they are called, of the Court of Session, is worse than superfluous. It is like having too many servants—they are continually in each other's way, they break the furniture, they interrupt work, and create delay. Your case is called in the First Division; your senior counsel is engaged in the second; you are fortunate if you have it struck out of the roll, and have to wait for six months till it have again a chance to be heard; for it often happens that your junior counsel is forced to plead your case against two on the other side—and it is decided against you without the possibility of redress, except that very pleasant and cheap one, an appeal to the House of Lords. We recommend, therefore, the abolition of one of the Inner Houses, and the despatching of the four Judges, thus liberated, two and two, at stated intervals, not exceeding a few weeks, throughout the kingdom, for the trial of delinquents. We are aware that it is held out as of great advantage that the same Judges should decide both civil and criminal cases; but we are not convinced by the reasoning on this subject, nor that law, any more than a mechanical trade, is not benefited by the operatives confining themselves to particular departments of it. But, admitting it were true, the Judges of the Court of Session might make the circuits in rotation, nine constantly sitting in Edinburgh, while four were on the circuits. The Judges on the circuits might also hear and decide appeals from the Sheriffs-Substitute, while the Deputes were attending the Court of Session in Edinburgh, for the purpose of keeping up their knowledge of law, as is alleged. Our plan would, no doubt, impose much additional duty on the Judges of the Supreme Courts; but they are well paid for it: their salaries have lately been raised, the days of sinecure are fast disappearing, and these are not the times for any set of men taking the public money without working for it.

THE PENNY POSTAGE SCHEME is in great danger, and it is only by the utmost exertions, that it will ever have the least chance of becoming the law of the country. We were, we must confess, exceedingly suspicious that all was not right, when we found that the Penny Postage Act, as it was called, enacted nothing at all as to the rate of postage, but left all open to the Lords of the Treasury. Only a few weeks ago, it was alleged by the Whig Journals, as a reason for the Treasury not having announced why "the Uniform Penny Post" was not carried into effect, that the innumerable plans and suggestions which had been received, required the most deliberate consideration of "my Lords," but that the measure would be in operation in a very short time. This announcement appeared in The Morning Chronicle, on the 2d November, before the Chartist Insurrection in Wales had taken place. Two days afterwards, Newport was attacked, and the Ministerialists having, no doubt, been convinced of the danger of the free communication of the People with each other, by the articles in the Quarterly Review and the Tory newspapers and by this attack, just ten days afterwards bring out their Treasury Minute, dated 12th November, not for "THE UNIFORM PENNY POST," but for anything but a uniform "FOURPENNY POST," and that even to be conducted on principles wholly at variance with those which Mr Rowland Hill has uniformly advocated. In the first place, franking, one of the grossest abuses of the present system, is to be retained in its full efficiency, thereby saving many thousands a-year to the aristocracy, and to tradesmen in London, or elsewhere, who happen to be in good odour with them; although the exemption is attempted to be concealed in the minute, by placing it at the end, under the head of the "London District Post." Prepayment is not enforced; an omission which, of itself, is sufficient to defeat Rowland Hill's plan.

Whatever is lost on the General Post, is attempted to be made up on the existing Penny Post. At present, letters carried by the Penny Post must be under four ounces in weight; but, by the proposed plan, a letter of three ounces and a quarter, sent by the Penny Post, will be charged sixpence; for the minute states, 1st, that, "Two postages are to be added for every ounce up to sixteen ounces, beyond which, no packet, subject to postage, shall be received;" and, 2d, "Inferior rates, under fourpence, to remain undisturbed; but the letters to be charged by weight." The Treasury minute seems evidently to be drawn up to mystify and mislead, and, in every point of view, is a most discreditable document. What meaning may be ultimately attached to it we know not for many of the passages bear more than one at least. Our strong conviction, however, is, that the aristocracy—Whig and Tory—having, at the eleventh hour, seen the danger to which a free intercourse by letters, among the People, would expose hypocrisy, monopoly, and fraud, have joined together to defeat the Penny Postage, and that this Treasury minute is the first official evidence of the conspiracy in which they are engaged. We are not to be blarneyed over to the "Fourpenny minute" by such a statement as the following, which we find in the Scotsman, a paper which has hitherto advocated Mr Hill's plan. "It will scarcely be possible, we suspect, to introduce the uniform penny rate at the New Year, but the great reduction now announced may well reconcile the public to the want of it for a month or two." We are quite willing to wait for it, "for a month or two," as we feel strongly inclined to think, with the Morning Post, that the Penny Post has got its quietus, and that the "Fourpenny Post," is all we are likely to have for some time. While we denounce this attempt to defeat a great measure, by false pretences, we give the Whigs credit for the address, or rather cunning, with which they have managed it, and only hope that it is one of the last stratagems which "Plain John" will attempt before he ascends the judicial bench of Ireland, where we wish him long life and happiness. We are, however, mistaken if "my Lords," whether Whig or Tory, will succeed in gulling the able and energetic men who have hitherto advocated the "Penny Postage;" but the country must be roused, without a day's delay.

THE USE OF AN ARMY.—A month or two ago we pointed out a change in the management of the Army, in time of peace, which had occurred within the last half century. We stated that formerly they were employed in the making of roads and bridges, and other useful labours; but owing to the jealousy which has arisen of their having any intercourse with the "Civilians," they are now kept in idleness in forts and barracks. It appears, however, that the Continental Sovereigns are not under the same alarm of intercourse between their soldiers and their subjects that our's now exhibits. Between the years 1816 and 1838, the Swedish army wrought on Canals and Rivers, 4,164,000 days work; on roads and bankings, 130,000; on civil constructions, 241,000; and on fortifications, 501,700. In 1832, they completed the Canal between the North Sea and the Baltic, across the widest part of Sweden. Why should our soldiers not be employed in the same manner, instead of idling in the streets? What is there in the condition of Sweden that makes it safe to employ the army there in useful labours, and unsafe here? We suspect the investigation, which would be necessary to give an answer, would prove that we are not so much "the envy of surrounding nations" as many of us imagine.

MR AYTOUN AND THE DUNFERMLINE BURGHS.—We are glad to find that Mr Aytoun has every chance of carrying these Burghs at a new election. His canvass has drawn down upon him the wrath of the Whig press; and accusations of indolence and want of information, and of incapacity, have been made against him. From any opinion, however, that we have been able to form of him from his appearances at Public Meetings, and his conduct in the Town Council of this city, we are convinced that there are not many of the 658 present Members of Parliament who do their duty to their constituents more faithfully than would Mr Aytoun. In what respect he is inferior to Lord Dalmeny, we confess, we are not aware; nor do we recollect any brilliant appearances of his Lordship in Parliament, nor any active exertions in Committee, nor indeed any of his speeches at all, except the absurd harangue against Vote by Ballot, which did not contain a single argument nor a single statement which had not, a thousand times before, been made, and as often refuted. There are two most valuable qualities in which Mr Aytoun is not excelled by any man now in Parliament—honesty and courage. He is not likely to do what many representatives have done—hold out certain opinions on the hustings, and vote against them in Parliament. Lord Dalmeny is rather a favourable specimen of a young Whig nobleman; but he is a most unsuitable representative of the Radical Constituency of Dunfermline. The proper Constituency for his Lordship is West Lothian, now occupied by a Tory; and he ought long ere now to have canvassed that county; but so long as he is allowed quietly to nestle in these Burghs, he will never make the attempt. Rather than be excluded from Parliament altogether, we have no doubt he would make an exertion to attain the position fitting a nobleman of his rank and fortune—that of a county member.

FREE TRADE.—NEW TARIFF.—One of the arguments constantly reiterated by the opponents of free trade, is the want of reciprocity, on the part of foreign nations: by which they mean that though we lower the duty on imports, foreigners will not follow our example, and, in like manner, lower the duties on the articles they import. Now, although this statement were true, it is no reason whatsoever for our not resorting to free trade. Such a trade may not be so advantageous as it would otherwise be, if foreigners adhere to the protective system; but still it is highly advantageous that we should be enabled to purchase in the cheapest market, although we may not also be able to sell in the dearest. It is evidently no reason whatever for our not procuring our food cheap, that some foreign governments will not allow their subjects to obtain cheap cotton clothing from Britain. But the truth is, that foreigners are most willing to enter into commercial treaties with this country on the principles of free trade; and nothing but our obstinate adherence to the restrictive system, especially in the important articles of corn, food and drink, of all sorts, and timber, prevents the most complete system of reciprocity the greatest zealot for restrictions could desire. But even without such treaties, the principles of free trade are making rapid progress on the Continent. A party in this country has been actively engaged for years in abusing Russia, and endeavouring, by every effort, to engage us in war with that country; yet in the new Russian tariff, which came into force in 1837, nearly 100 articles that were prohibited by the former tariff, are now admitted on the payment of duties, and the duties on many articles formerly admitted are greatly reduced. The British will derive the chief benefit from these alterations, because we have by far the largest share of the trade with Russia. The new Austrian tariff, which came into operation in 1838, reduces the duties on many articles; and in no instance, we believe, is there any increase. Although it is a country producing abundance of grain and all sorts of food, our absurd example of prohibiting their importation has not been imitated: but fresh animal food of all sorts is allowed to be imported at a duty of 1s. 8d. for 123½ lbs.; wheat at 9d. for the same weight, or about 3s. the imperial quarter; barley and oats at 6d. for 123½ lbs., or about 1s. 6d. a-quarter. It is plain the landed interest must not be so powerful, or at least so despotic, in Austria as in Britain. The Prussian Commercial League is often appealed to as an instance of the hostile feelings with which foreigners view the trade of this country; and it is even asserted that its chief, if not sole, object was to diminish our exports. But this is not the fact. The real object was to put down the innumerable and vexatious restraints that impeded the intercourse of the German States. Generally speaking, the duties on imports are reasonable. On printed cottons, worth 1s. 6d. a-yard, it is only sixteen per cent.; on fine cottons, worth 2s. 6d., under nine per cent.; our own duties on cotton manufactures generally amount to twenty per cent., and are never less than ten. Although the League has now been in operation for six years, and includes twenty-five millions of people, so far from our trade with Prussia and Germany falling off, it is greater at this moment than when the League was entered into. Had Prussia, indeed, altogether prohibited the import of our goods, we would have had very little reason to complain. She has only three great staple articles of export—corn, timber, and wool. The first we virtually prohibit in ordinary years; on the second we impose a duty of 55s. per load, while Canadian timber is admitted at 10s.; and it is only of late years, and after we found that our manufactures were going to ruin for want of foreign wool, that the prohibitory duty of 6d. per lb. was taken off German wool.

TRADE AND MANUFACTURES.

From the 29th of August to the 18th of November, no fewer than sixty-six sequestrations have been awarded against mercantile men and tradesmen in Scotland—a number, we believe, almost without precedent in a period of equal duration. It is occasioned, we have no doubt, in part, by the new act coming into operation, whereby much expense and delay are saved in comparison with the old system; but the accounts from the manufacturing districts shew that, everywhere, trade is greatly depressed. We shall quote a few specimens of these accounts. In Dundee, many excellent mechanics are idle, and the manufacturers are not faring better; forty-five have set off for France. In Montrose, there are a considerable number of fixdressers out of employment. In Arbroath, there are many complaints. In Paisley, there are a number of weavers out of employment. At Manchester, prices of yarn continue to droop. At Huddersfield, prices have a downward tendency, and the warehouses and shops exhibit an unusual state of inactivity; and, every week, the number of unemployed operatives increases. An important failure in Glasgow, to the amount of £80,000, and several of inferior amount, in Manchester and Dundee, have been announced. The stoppage of almost all the banks of the United States has paralysed trade in America; but cheering prospects for the future continue to be held out. A great part of the present depression of our manufactures is, no doubt, to be attributed to our Corn-Laws, which have drained the country of bullion, and rendered it impossible for bankers to give the usual accommodation to manufacturers and merchants.

AGRICULTURE.

It is impossible yet to form any opinion of the late harvest, but, from all we can gather, it has little chance of turning out an average produce. Prices of late have certainly not risen, but this arises from the quantity of bad grain which the farmers, being anxious to get rid of, have thrown on the market. There is, however, one important fact already ascertained, which is, that the wheat crop is exceedingly deficient in Ireland. In ordinary years, Ireland exports to Britain £1,000,000 worth of wheat, but it is estimated that this year she will require wheat to the value of £800,000, to make up her own deficiency. However that may be, there has already been a considerable importation of English wheat into Ireland. We may here notice a very important use to which a coarse grass, which abounds on all parts of the sea coasts of Scotland, where sandy, has been put to in America. The grass is known by the name of bent, in Scotland, and sea reed or beach grass, in England: it is the Arundo arenaria of Linnæus. The only use it has been put to hitherto, is to prevent the loose sand from shifting and blowing over the cultivated grounds, or filling up harbours, and for making door-matts. But it has been discovered that it makes admirable paper—smooth, soft, pleasant to write on, and very firm and strong. The grass is easily whitened, and the pasteboard made from it is especially valuable. We hope some of the papermakers in this neighbourhood will try this material; for the collecting of it would give employment to the poor, besides rendering us independent of foreigners for rags. If found to answer, it could be cultivated to any extent, on sands which are at present utterly worthless.

ALL HALLOW FAIR was the best for dealers that has occurred for many years. The number of cattle was about 8,000, being 3,000 or 4,000 less than last year. About 6,000 of the cattle were disposed of the first day, and the whole were cleared off next day. West Highlanders, three year old, brought from £8 to £10: 10s.; two year old, £4: 4s. to £6: 6s.; stirks, £2: 10s. to £4: 10s. North country cattle realized from £9: 9s. to £10: 15s.; two year olds, £7: 10s. to £10: 16s.; one prime lot of twenty short-horned cattle were sold for £19 a-head. The prices altogether were from 25 to 30 per cent. above those at the same fair last year. Of sheep and lambs, 2,800 were shewn. Prices were on the advance, and may be stated at 6½d. per lb. The show of horses in the Grassmarket was small; and there was little demand for those of inferior quality. A few good horses for agricultural purposes, brought from £50 to £70 per pair.

TO POLITICAL CORRESPONDENTS.

AT the close of the year, and approaching the opening of, probably, the final Session of "Lucky" Lord Melbourne's Government, we regret exceedingly that pressure for time, together with the previous state of our columns, prevent us, in the present month, from publishing "The Claims of the Melbourne Administration to the Support of Reformers Considered." The article we consider too important in its bearings on the cause of National Improvement to admit of curtailment.

Tory-Radical, as, in common with every consistent and disinterested Reformer, we have the honour to be styled by the apostate and hireling Treasury scribes, and those who either fasten or hope yet to thrive by Whig official patronage, the miserable plight to which the Whigs have reduced themselves by their five years of shuffling and dishonesty almost disarms resentment. The place of indignation is now occupied by pity, not in the least allied to respect:—

"Fallen Cherubs, to be weak is miserable, Doing or suffering!"

The warmest advocates of the Government—i. e., the best paid, in the kind of coin most acceptable to themselves—are themselves urging the weakness of the Ministry as a plea for the compassion and forbearance of Reformers, and as an argument for granting them yet a little more support, a little more succour in their extreme need. What has reduced them to this deplorable state of weakness? Dishonesty: Toryism at heart, and the shallow hypocrisy of pretended Liberalism, now and then assumed in order to retain their place. What has made them thus contemptible in their weakness? Their deliberate bit-by-bit betrayal of the cause by which they rose into power. They have ostentatiously shewn—while their creatures do not hesitate to boast—that they carry the Court in their pockets. Ireland is vaunted to be at their beck—under their spells. Of the moderate Reformers—the very, very moderate Reformers—they enjoy the confidence; and they have the support of the middle-class Electors in the towns, for doing, if not much, yet their little possible, and "keeping out the Tories." This is, indeed, their greatest, if not their only merit in the eyes of many. And with this united strength, and with Mr Macaulay and Mr Sheil placing their shoulders to the wheel of improvement—as Sir John Cam Hobhouse, Sir Henry Parnell, and many other Liberals and patriots did before them—it is still acknowledged that the Ministry is weak, and urgently requires more support; and who, save Tory-Radicals, can refuse the modest demand to men so tried, so proved, so everyway deserving, from their principles, their measures, and, above all, from their sincerity and courage? We again mention our regret that we cannot at present publish our Contributor's examination of the claims of the Melbourne Ministry upon every man in the country who professes to be a Reformer; as these claims are stated by—among other of their advocates of less celebrity though of equal zeal—Mr Macaulay, in the Apology for the Whigs, entitled "A Defence," published in the Edinburgh Review, and attributed to his pen.
